CROSSED WIRES A Thrilling New Serial By John T. McCutcheon

MAIDEN MEDITATIONS by Sara Moore

A double-barrelled opportunity

The Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate offers to newspapers two new features. The first, "Crossed Wires," is a weekly serial by John T. McCutcheon, the famous cartoonist. Thousands will recall with pleasure his two previous serials, "An Heir at Large" and "The Restless Age." "Crossed Wires" surpasses these efforts in tense thrills, gripping excitement, high adventure and sheer romance. Probably no other features have become so immediately popular as the McCutcheon stories, and certainly no others have as well proven their value in getting and maintaining circulation in The Chicago Tribune and The News of New York. "Crossed Wires" is illustrated by Mr. McCutcheon in his own inimitable style. It is available in half page mat form and is a weekly feature.

The other feature illustrated in the cut is "Maiden Meditations," a new half page women's feature by Sara Moore. It is exceptionally clever and original—so much so that The Chicago Tribune is using it on the top half of the first page of the Women's Section of The Sunday Tribune. This feature is just what its name implies—the thoughts of a 1926 flapper, written in verse and beautifully illustrated by the author.

These two features will make a valuable page in any newspaper—a double-barrelled opportunity for progressive newspapers to buy leadership in their territories.

Farmers live next door to the city—in Iowa

THINK of the Iowa farmer as a man who lives in the suburbs, and you will have a true picture of him.

In fact, the automobile, the radio and the telephone have really put the typical farm of this state inside the city limits.

Remember also that even in the so-called rural districts every Iowa family takes a daily newspaper.

Further, the farmers of Iowa, like their city cousins, are highly intelligent. Iowa has the smallest percentage of illiteracy of any state in the union.

Couple these facts with the new era of prosperity daily gaining momentum throughout a state whose per capita wealth is already larger than that of any other state, and you have a market for merchandise second to none in the entire country.

Obviously your best choice of a medium to reach this prosperous market is the daily Iowa newspaper.

Another Great Automobile Advertiser Says Farewell to Free Puffery

President of Chrysler Corporation and Advertising Manager Support Editor & Publisher's Fight—Declare Newspapers Can Kill Publicity Evil

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

C. E. T. SCHARPS, advertising manager of the Chrysler Sales Corporation, Detroit, Mich., has waved farewell to automotive "free puffery" in the newspapers.

C. E. T. Scharps

His assertion to that effect, made in an interview in New York this week, was strengthened by his admission that it was becoming "increasingly difficult to get free publicity into certain newspapers" and his presentation, off the record, of other details which tended to show conclusively that Editor & Publisher's campaign against the trash writing press agent was showing real results.

"I will be glad to see free puffery go," Mr. Scharps declared. "At the same time I am firmly convinced there is such a thing as legitimate automobile news.

"The fact that there are 18,000,000 automobile users in the United States today, and the fact that thousands are willing and do pay admission to an annual automobile show to see models they can look at for nothing at other times seems conclusive proof to me that the public demands real news of our field.

"There will be no 'free publicity evil,' when the newspapers themselves see fit to eliminate it. A sincere automobile editor will throw out the trash and print only the news. Free puffery never added interest to a newspaper automobile section.

"Of course, we are sending out free publicity now. But we don't demand that it be published. Whether or not it is published is the newspapers business, not ours, we think. No law compels the automobile editor to publish it. We never have and never will base our advertising schedules on the amount of free publicity used. As a matter of fact, however, we don't see any objection to the stories we are sending out, because we are making an honest effort to issue only real automobile news."

"What is real automobile news?" Mr. Scharps was asked, and in reply he outlined his ideal of a newspaper automobile section, one which, he said, would attract automobile using readers to a newspaper, the desideratum of all automobile advertisers. Mr. Scharps was himself an automobile editor in New York, prior to accepting the Chrysler post last June.

"Legitimate automobile news," he said, supplies information, which would aid a person in the operation of his individual transportation unit.

"An interesting and worthwhile automobile section tells readers about the condition of the local highways, maps out tours, informs of detours, speed traps, supplies mechanical information, presents details of new developments, and describes new models as they are announced.

"An automobile editor, with courage, will go to his local automobile row and discuss the new models as dispassionately as the newspaper dramatic critic now discusses the new plays."

Mr. Scharps said he had read with interest the interview with A. R. Erskine, president of the Studebaker Corporation, printed in Editor & Publisher, Nov. 21, but declared he disagreed with Mr. Erskine in putting the automobile in the same class with washing machines or pianos.

"There is still a romance in the ownership and possession of a motor car," he said, "which takes it out of the class of ordinary goods.

"A lot of people, to be sure, own washing machines and pianos. But whoever heard a group discussing heatedly the merits of this or that piano?

"Have you ever heard a conversation like this: 'Have you seen the new model Steinway, some class, eh?' 'Oh, I don't know, you ought to see my Knabe. I've been playing it ten years now, and it's good as new.'"

"Perhaps not the same words," I countered, "But among musicians, certainly, similar conversations are common."

"It certainly isn't as widespread as auto talk," Mr. Scharps argued, "and, as I understand it, news is anything that interests people and that which interests the largest number is the best news. That editors realize this can be seen in the play they give the announcement of new models."

Mr. Scharps gave evidence that certain newspapers were tightening up in the matter of printing publicity.

"In order to keep from printing publicity matter, and, at the same time print automobile reading matter," he declared, "some newspapers are now, it seems to me, making themselves a little absurd.

"Mr. Chrysler, for instance, is permitted to talk about anything under the sun, except what he knows best, the making of automobiles.

"A little more intelligence among automobile editors will, I think, rectify the situation. I, for one, will be glad to see real automobile news take the place of trash on the automobile pages."

After graduation from Columbia University, New York, Mr. Scharps began a long term as newspaper man. First, in 1904, he became a reporter for the New York Sun, remaining on the street for that newspaper until 1910. In the latter year he commenced collecting automobile news, and after three years was made automobile editor. Leaving newspaper work in 1916, he spent a year in the automobile business in New York, and then returned as automobile editor of the New York Tribune, where he remained five years, before transferring to the old New York Evening Mail. He went to the Telegram in charge of automobile advertising and news, when Mr. Munsey consolidated the two papers, and left the Telegram last June to join the Chrysler organization.

"Chrysler's great success," he said, "has been due to three points. We have a good product; it is well engineered; and it is well advertised and sold.

"Advertising has played a huge part in this success. Introduced in the pages of the Saturday Evening Post in 1924, the account almost immediately went into the newspapers, and we have been a consistent user of the latter media ever since.

"During 1926 we are going into newspapers on a larger scale than we did in 1925, when by our co-operative plan with dealers we used 1,000 dailies. Our increase in 1926 will take the form of larger space.

"The trend generally in automobile circles seems to be towards the newspapers. It is my opinion that you cannot do an all-around job, however, without using all the standard forms of advertising.

"The best advertising, for quick sales, I believe, is a strong newspaper campaign, supplemented by space in the magazines, use of billboards, and direct-by-mail. Use all four, and use them intelligently, and results will show.

"In automotive advertising copy the trend seems to be towards the explanatory rather than the exclamatory style. Even those firms whose advertising has been conspicuously restrained, seem this year to be inclined more towards detail, than heretofore.

"The purchase of an automobile is usually a very important event in a man's life next to the purchase of a home, and in some cases considered more important even than that. He is inclined to study the various offerings with extreme care, before he allows himself to be separated from his money.

"Therefore, it is my conclusion, that the advertising that satisfies most of the questions arising in a prospective purchaser's mind, answering them without extravagance, in order to carry conviction, is the best, the most productive of results. Such copy must give an impression of the car and enough of the detail to suit the general needs of the prospects. It must, above all, incite a desire for further investigation, because, no matter how much advertising is placed, the show room and the demonstration cannot be eliminated."

Mr. Scharps said the Chrysler co-operative advertising plan, by which the dealer and the manufacturer split the cost 50-50, had proved very successful. In some cases, mats and electros were sent direct to newspapers, while in others they were sent to the local dealer to be used at their discretion.

CHRYSLER CORPORATION PRESIDENT SAYS FREE PUBLICITY WILL NOT SELL GOODS

WALTER P. CHRYSLER, president of the Chrysler Sales Corporation, Detroit, has joined A. R. Erskine, president of the Studebaker Corporation, in denouncing the present free publicity system.

Walter P. Chrysler

"Publicity," Mr. Chrysler declared this week in New York, "will not take the place of advertising. Publicity will not sell goods except in so far as a good name is an asset to any institution and the product which it merchandises.

"There has been a good deal of opposition on the part of the American newspapers and periodicals to the attempt on the part of business to get printed, free of charge, articles praising merchandise which properly belong in the advertising columns.

"I am in sympathy with this stand. No one has a right to expect to get something for nothing."

MOTOR FIRMS PLANNING LARGER AD SCHEDULES

Large 1925 Automobile Sales Coupled With Widespread Prosperity Indicate 1926 Linage Will Surpass High Total of 1925—Ad Plans of Various Firms Reviewed

By JAMES T. SULLIVAN

AMERICA'S prodigy among industries —the automotive business—got away to a good start in New York for its annual National show season. There was a wonderful display of advertising in the newspapers. Show issue gains were 20 per cent. upwards. It will be the same story at Chicago beginning two weeks after Grand Central Palace closes its doors.

What about 1926? Figuring that if a key city like Boston could carry a minimum of 2,500,0000 lines of automotive display, and there are at least 10 equally important other cities, that because of fewer papers in most of them, would have at least 1,500,000 it gives a good basis for comparisons. As a matter of fact there are 25 cities of major importance, for the writer grouped Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington as one; selected Atlanta for the South omitting Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, Jacksonville, Galveston, etc.; eliminated Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cincinnati, Louisville in another group; passed over all the New England cities outside of Boston; did not include such places as Denver, Omaha, Indianapolis, Seattle, Portland, Ore., Rochester, Syracuse, Albany, Pittsburgh, Harrisburg, etc. Easily their minimum could be 30,000,000. Add smaller places, and the classified advertising with an easily computed 50,000,000 lines. The writer wants to be conservative and he is speaking solely of newspapers. This year he feels the linage will surpass 1925 but not overwhelmingly.

On the basis of earning in 1925 where many companies in the first six to nine months made more than in the entire 1924 it gives a larger margin to work with this year. And because of various conditions larger advertising appropriations are likely to be made. The first six months looks good. So did the first half of 1925. But last year the sales curve kept going upward steadily. Because of this car makers are planing to keep going at pretty nearly normal production for the time being.

Last year being an off one, politically, people had a chance to pay more attention to business. Conditions improved in the Middle West. The Pacific Coast settled its unprofitable long term finance motor plans. New England textiles, boots and shoes, and some other industries grew better. The South and Southwest came back stronger. We have had an open winter in the North.

This year is going to bring its troubles. There will be the political scramble which will put new faces in the Senate and House. As the tidal wave carrying Harding to Washington left its undertow, which two years later rocked the ship of State Coolidge is going to find some rapids ahead of him after the votes are counted. That means inattention to business for a few months by many prospective buyers of cars, particularly in the Middle West.

New England is talking prospective wage cuts in textiles, which are pretty certain to bring strikes. The woolen industry has not prospered as expected and may not improve. Legislation on motor cars was passed with more coming that is bound to prevent ready sales of used cars. Check the sale of used cars and new car sales drop off.

Throughout the country finance corporations in their fight for business in some cases went too far. Stretching out terms to nearly two years put new cars in many hands that could not afford them. And in some cases buyers bought cars too expensive for themselves. Many makers are curtailing these long term plans now. The down payments are to be more and the limit is lessened.

However, when the competition reaches the boiling point as mid-summer approaches, the plans of today may be revised to meet the conditions of tomorrow. The automotive industry is one that never needed Government regulation, for competition is its big symbol.

Everyone in the industry knows that 1926 is looked upon as a critical sales year. Big production means cars at low prices. It cuts overhead. So intensive sales plans have ben worked out; men have been brought from the four corners of the earth for factory sales conferences; weak dealers are going to be weeded out; in big cities where there was one distributor there will be associate or sub-dealers; places that never were thought big enough for a dealership will be combed for possible agents.

Some of the factories may be forced to sell close to cost to keep up with the procession. Despite increased prices of rubber, steel and other materials the public has not been keyed up to accept a considerable jump in cost of motor cars, if any. There is some likelihood of other changes such as marked the bringing together of Cleveland and Chandler. This means cutting overhead and coordinating efficiency.

Because factory officials increased their individual earnings last year through owning stock in their companies that rose in values, and in many cases received bonuses, they are meeting 1926 with a smile. Any who may have had a tendency to ride on the wave of prosperity with a care-free idea of letting this year take care of itself until it got here will be submerged before it ends. It is going to be a he-man's battle to keep production and sales up to the 4,000,000 mark despite talk about replacement possibilities, virgin fields, export sales, etc.

The motor shows throughout the country will be watched closer than ever. Orders from them generally keep the factory going normally. There will be exhibitions of one kind or another in 100 or more places in the next three months, and the wise factory heads will see to it that some people with a sense for news and facts will attend a number of them to get barometer readings. By getting the reason for the rumblings here and there; the clouds on various horizons; the balancing of ideas between where there has been a good crop of commodities in one section, but strikes in another nearby to offset the former; studying the advertising more closely to get the relations of fine circulation value vs. inflated free service that does not sell cars; all these and more must fill the curriculum of factory executives who expect to make 1926 end successfully for the stock owners.

This is not planned as a pessimistic yarn, but a suggestion of going after facts. The industry cannot stand getting bumped every few years as good reliable dealers are not made over night. It is merely a statement for all of us in any way affiliated with the industry to take as a slogan for 1926—"Let's not kid ourselves—too much."

Meanwhile, appropriations for 1926 in many cases, are being planned on a larger scale. Conditions will govern whether they go through as planned. Some companies will increase their linage, others curtail. At present things look bright for all the really substantial papers, because the tendency to larger copy in few papers to get the messages across will be more evident than ever this year.

Here are some reasons for increased linage this year:

General Motors has its new baby, the Pontiac Six, and it will spend thousands to put that across. Oakland will not be allowed to suffer an eclipse by reason of 700 or so Pontiacs coming out of the same city daily. Oldsmobile had a session of sales managers working for distributors from all over the world recently at which all were drilled with the idea of increasing sales which will be backed by liberal advertising. Buick advertising has been one of the most liberal the past few years and it is going to continue so. And the same will be equally true of Chevrolet. Chadillac got into the running again last year with good results and will do more now. With the combination of Yellow Cab Company and G M C trucks these two are going to stage a series of newspaper announcements beginning soon coming from the Cochrane Agency, Chicago. This group alone will spend enough money in many papers to make a substantial total. Just how much it is going to be no one can foretell now because present plans are likely to be augmented.

Then there is Nash with its new Ajax built to be an aristocrat in the small car class, or as Mr. Nash puts it, to be patterned on the same quality as the larger car of an owner who needs an Ajax type for quick city service. There were few Sundays last year when Nash half pages were missing, and that is going to be the Ajax policy. This means an average of two pages a month as the copy will alternate.

VALUE OF WEEKLIES UNDERESTIMATED BY NATIONAL ADVERTISERS

By BERT MOSES

THIRTY-FIVE years ago Rowell was perhaps the dominating man in the advertising world. He was, as a matter of fact, about the only man who advanced any new ideas in the pastime of publicity. And usually, when he arrived at a conclusion, he put it right over the plate and at the same time hit out a home run. In baseball this would be called an idiosyncrasy. But we are here discussing advertising.

Bert M. Moses

One of Rowell's notions was that the weekly newspaper, as a medium for national advertisers, was machts nichts aus, or words to the same effect. He read it right out of church, without benefit or consolation of the clergy. And "out" it has been ever since.

Rowell's crusade was really prompted by the disposition on the part of publishers of weeklies to tell everything about their calculations except the truth. This same propensity characterized the publishers of dailies as well, but somebody has to supply the os coccyx to be kicked, and the publisher of the little weekly was IT in caps.

Rowell, as everybody used to know, and should know now, was the single pioneer who started the movement for honest circulation figures. He issued a newspaper directors, and put in most of his working and dreaming hours devising means to separate the false from the true in circulation statements.

Week after week, in his Printers' Ink, he issued broadsides against the publisher who lied, and great was his joy when he caught one such man "with the goods on." He played him up like the editors of this day played up the Monkey Business down in Dayton, Tenn.

Rather than waste time with the multitude of weeklies published then, he lumped most of them in his directors as "JKL," which meant "less than one thousand" or "exceeding one thousand," I have forgotten which.

Rowell was superbly sane in nearly every position he took in advertising, but his ban on the weekly always seemed a mistake to me.

For let it be here stated still again that the weekly paper is a power in its own territory. Its influence gets under the skins of its readers, and what the editor of the weekly thinks is precisely what most of the folks in his community think. If you doubt this, ask any politician who knows politics. He will tell you that while he does not exactly relish the opposition of the big city daily, he is most anxious not to be opposed by the country editor.

Rowell's contention was that the weekly's circulation was too small to be effective. Let's see about that. Practically everybody in small communities takes the weekly paper, while but a few take a magazine or the big town daily. The weekly covers the territory intensively, while the big daily and the magazine scatter like a parcel of boys shooting craps when the constable shows up in the offing.

And yet the national advertisers spend a big percentage of their appropriations in city dailies and magazines. This is all right, of course, but the advertiser who thinks he is reaching the country folks when he omits the weeklies needs his mental machinery overhauled.

There are not so many weeklies as there used to be, but there are a lot more dailies. In many cases the good weekly has gone out and a poor daily has come in. Today, in countless small cities, little dailies are struggling for existence where weeklies formerly made good money. The poor daily hasn't the power and influence of the good weekly, by a long shot, as we would say in Boston, and my choice in such a case would be the weekly to carry my ad every time.

The publisher of the weekly does more hard work and gets less out of it than any other worker I know. He is the balance wheel and safety valve of the neighborhood he serves. His influence is always for the good, and I salute him as Brother. He has my sympathies and is close to my heart.

To make these few remarks for him gives me joy, and to at least modify the poor esteem in which he is held by national advertisers is the one thought that pushes this pen along.

PLANS MADE TO IMPROVE MUNSEY PROPERTIES

William T. Dewart Will Carry Out Ideas of Late Publisher For Increasing Efficiency of Sun and Telegram—Life Story of New President

WILLIAM T. DEWART, whose ability as an executive and knowledge of newspaper publishing led Frank A. Munsey before his death to direct that he be made president of the companies publishing the New York Sun and the New York Telegram, in answer to an inquiry by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, as to his plans for these two newspapers, replied as follows:

"I have your request for a statement from me regarding Mr. Munsey's newspaper properties.

"The future of both the Sun and the New York Telegram is assured to the city of New York and its interests, to the state and to the nation. They will both continue to express those principles and uphold those ideals to which they were committed by Mr. Munsey.

"With a circulation activity quite satisfactory, and a national and local advertising patronage which for the last six months has made the Sun the continuous leader in the New York evening field, to think of any other plan than that above expressed would be to confess to the poorest sort of newspaper judgment.

"The constant endeavor of the management will be to further improve both papers, to spend more money, time and effort in multiplying their effectiveness both as to news and service.

"They will continue to stand for those things and measures which will contribute most largely to the public good and increase most greatly the opportunity of men, women and children to lead healthy, happy, prosperous lives.

"The Sun has faced for months the necessity of a larger and more efficient plant. Plans are in the making for additional press equipment and added mechanical facilities.

"The New York Telegram, now occupying a building and using an equipment forced upon it by the emergencies of the pressmen's strike will also have to have better quarters and more efficient machinery.

"All of these problems were in process of solution by Mr. Munsey and his uncompleted ideas will be developed and finished by me.

"There need not be the slightest anxiety in anybody's part as to the future of the Sun or the Telegram."

The law firm of Watson, Godley, Shepard & Willguss, New York, issued a statement this week to the effect the Munsey newspapers would probably be continued for the next five years under their present management.

"It is understood," reads the law firm's statement, "that Mr. Munsey's active properties, such as the Sun, the New York Telegram, the Mohican Company and other enterprises will probably be operated with their present organization for at least the next five years, to the end that the fund which will ultimately go to the Metropolitan Museum of Art may be even larger than anticipated."

The Sun is preparing in pamphlet form a biographical sketch of Mr. Dewart, written by Elinor Elgin for the Boston Sunday Post. Excerpts from Miss Elgin's article follow:

"If it were customary in this country to display coats of arms, an appropriate escutcheon for William T. Dewart, who has succeeded to the presidency of the vast Frank A. Munsey enterprises, would bear a lawn mower in one quarter, a bar of music above a sledge hammer rampant in another, retorts and test tubes in a third and two gold watches in the fourth. The crest would represent an American eagle soaring mountainous obstacles and the motto would be "Learn It and Do It." Each of these would have symbolic allusion to some stage in the career of a remarkable man. At 50 Mr. Dewart finds himself in charge of two New York newspapers, several magazines, various banking, real estate, and financial undertakings.

William T. Dewart

Mr. Munsey's will designated him as first of three executors, the others being Mr. Dewart's friend and associate, Mr. R. H. Titherington, and the Guaranty Trust Company of New York. He was already vice-president, treasurer and managing director of all the Munsey corporations, and but a simple formality was required in each instance to make him president, which was done in accordance with the express wish of Mr. Munsey.

It is evident that Mr. Munsey's confidence in him was unbounded, but it would be inaccurate to describe the relationship between them by so cold a phrase. It was well known of Frank Munsey that he did not wear his heart on his sleeve for daws to peck at. Few persons were able to penetrate the barriers of reserve which he threw up to guard a really sensitive nature. Mr. Dewart could and did.

It is no violation of the privacy to say that from an association which began in an ordinary business way a personal attachment sprang up between them which bound them with unbreakable ties of friendship.

It is not hard to understand how Mr. Dewart could inspire a stalwart friendship. He belongs to the type of business men commonly described as "approachable."

This new head of the Munsey concerns is a well set up man of robust physique. His eyes are clear and blue-gray, but with a tendency to shade into hazel. His face is strong and marked about the eyes with the lines of good humor. Much out of doors living has given him a complexion inclined to the ruddy. He is of about the average height, with broad shoulders and deep chest. His weight must be around 180 pounds; his step is elastic, almost springy. His dark hair is liberally besprinkled with gray, but he looks nearer 40 years of age than 50.

His speech is incisive without being sharp. Like all good administrators he has mastered the art of quick decision.

Mr. Dewart is of Scottish origin. His ancestors came from Duart Castle, Mull, Scotland. He belongs to the Maclean Clan, the present head of which is Sir Fitzroy Maclean, owner of Duart Castle and of a town house in London. His mother, whose maiden name was Jessie Graham, was the daughter of a wealthy Scotch banker and landowner. His father, William Dewart, was a well known philosopher and economist who spent the early part of his life in Canada —a railroad builder with a flair for learning and with literary gifts above the ordinary.

He, more than any other man of his time, influenced and molded the national policy of protection under which Canada has prospered so splendidly since the middle seventies. His work in promoting the building of the Victoria Railway from Lindsay to Haliburton, now a part of the Grand Trunk system, was a far seeing and constructive accomplishment.

The elder Dewart was so engrossed with the pursuit of his ideals that he neglected the capture of riches. He left Canada and settled in Rochester, N. Y., where for some time his brood of eleven children found life anything but a summer day's encampment in a meadow flecked with daisies.

Here it was that the young William T. (the initial stands for Thompson, after a relative, a Captain Thompson who was one of the British guard over Napoleon at St. Helena) grappled with the three R's in public school. He required things which the family purse was too slender to supply. But there was a way to get them and he took it. He borrowed the $12 from an older brother and invested in a lawn mower. Barbering neighbors' grass plots was something for which the neighbors were willing to pay. So William with his mower and his oil can found steady employment. As he mowed he sang, for nature had endowed him with a musical voice which was afterwards to stand him in good stead. And he soon repaid the $12.

At the age of 14 he was ready for more serious undertakings. There was a button factory in his part of town and William developed a surprising interest in buttons; so the boss invited him to come in and learn the trade.

In a little while he learned that the key to the button business was in coloring the product. His employers manufactured what are known in the trade as "ivory" buttons. When William discovered that "horn" buttons brought higher prices he began to speculate on the probable profits that somebody would make who could find a way to make "ivory" ones that would look like horn.

The answer to that speculation lay in chemistry. Chemistry was to be learned at the University of Rochester, and William at once matriculated. Although he had been unable to take a high school course he was able to enter the university as a special student. There he formed an acquaintance with Dr. Samuel Allan Lattimore, professor of chemistry. Between them an attachment sprang up which endured so long as Prof. Lattimore lived.

By this time the boyish treble had ripened into a fine tenor. That was something which was also merchantable, and young Dewart was able to earn some much needed money by singing in choirs and quartets. His musical gift also brought him warm friends.

When he had sufficiently mastered the chemical secrets for which he had been seeking he left college, and he and his brother Robert found financial backing with which to start the German-American Button Company. About that time, however, the Cleveland tariff began to make itself felt, and profits were so reduced that the brothers decided to sell out. The button concern continued after their time however. When the World War came its name was changed to that of Art in Buttons, Inc.

For a time thereafter William engaged in trading on commission in sugar, tea, coffee, lubricating oils and the like for New York interests. Finally, at the urging of friends, he got a job with the Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburgh Railway with a view to finding his life's work.

His first assignment was with a wrecking crew. He got thirteen cents an hour for twelve hours a day. He applied for and got a transfer to the railroad machine shops, where he systematically set about learning how to operate every planer, buzz saw and lathe in the place.

But the railroads were getting their bumps in the coal regions, with strikes, lockouts and other labor difficulties. Young Dewart, looking for fresh fields saw public accountancy as a likelier opportunity for his talents. After a year or so of study he felt himself ready to tackle a big job.

Mr. Munsey had built a large printing plant in New London, Conn., but had decided to bring his publications back to New York. To utilize his New London building he opened a department store on the ground floor, with a hotel in the

URGES REVISION OF A. B. C. RULES TO BRAND PREMIUM CIRCULATION

Contest Promoters Fattening on Dailies' Craze for Readers While Publishers Stand Losses—Fault Lies With Newspapers, Writers Says

By A PUBLISHER

SOONER or later the A. B. C. will be compelled to grapple with the problem of higher ideals in circulation promotion. It has been nibbling around the edges, but opinion does not seem to be crystallized enough among the newspapers themselves to give the A. B. C. the necessary courage to tackle the job comprehensively.

At the last A. B. C. convention the question of outlawing voting contests and was side-stepped again by referring the whole question back to the board of directors.

The fault seems to lie with the newspapers themselves. The craze for circulation and linage dominance has apparently weakened the ideals of many newspaper managements. Those who believe in and practice sane methods and maintain decent ideals seem to lack the courage and determination to demand that their ideals be recognized and enforced by the A. B. C.

That a really great industry, such as the American press has become, can tolerate the contest and premium leeches who fatten on the profits of the industry, as they are doing now, is little short of a scandal and a disgrace.

No one knows how much these leeches extract from the profits of the American press, but it must run up into the millions annually.

It will be stopped some day, and sane newspaper managers hope that the day will not be far distant.

The A. B. C. is highly successful in its work of establishing the actual circulation of the press, but it has failed lamentably in establishing circulation ideals that determine what is actually merit circulation.

At the expense of being prolix, the writer desires to present a recent instance of the extremes to which the voting contest has been carried in an effort by one newspaper to retain leadership in circulation.

There are two evening newspapers in a city of about 70,000 population.

One of these newspapers has managed for four years to maintain a lead of a few hundred in total circulation by staging an annual voting contest.

The other has refused to resort to contests, but to protect itself has used premiums and other similar methods to offset the effect of the contests.

These contests enabled the first of these newspapers to add about 1,000 new subscribers each year. In the course of the following year the other paper would cut this lead down and another contest would be staged to get it back.

In the September reports of 1925 there was a difference of less than 200 in their total circulations, and another contest, the fourth, was launched by the first paper to enable it to keep the lead.

With a circulation of less than 10,000 this newspaper gave away 9 automobiles and 20 per cent of all cash turned in was paid to contestants.

The manager of the other newspaper, becoming incensed at the desperate measures of his opponent to retain the lead, decided to try and wreck the contest of his competitor.

He made a ten-day offer of a cut price to paid-in-advance subscribers, reducing from $8.40 to $4.50 for carrier distribution and from $4.00 to $2.00 for mail subscribers.

He did not think that his opponent would meet the cut, in view of the great expense of the contest, but he promptly did, cutting from $9.00 to $4.50, $4.00 to $2.00 and reducing his monthly rate from 75 to 40 cents and single copies from 3 to 2 cents.

Following are the approximate results of this suicidal fight for supremacy:

At the end of the ten-day period the newspaper that made the cut first closed its books with nearly half of its circulation paid in advance for a year and a net loss in circulation returns of approximately $15,000. No cut was made in the monthly rate nor the price of single copies and the paper is now back on the old price level.

The newspaper with the contest claims an increase of 4,000. Much of this is unquestionably duplication and much of it goes outside of its natural circulation area. But at what a loss to its revenues and to its prestige has it retained the elusive advantage of so-called supremacy.

Here are approximate figures that are really startling:

It is safe to presume that 6,000 of its subscribers, new and old, have taken advantage of the cut in rates to pay in advance. It accepted orders for three and five years and many of these have taken advantage of this.

Based on this estimate, the first year's results will be as follows:

6,000 subscribers	at	$9.00	$54,000
6,000 subscribers	at	4.50	27,000
Loss			$27,000
30% to contest manager		$8,100
20% to contestants		5,400	13,500
Balance			$13,500

Out of this balance must be paid the cost of the premiums and the expenses which will eat up the balance.

In other words, this 6,000 circulation will be a dead loss to the newspaper of over $50,000, and this loss will in no considerable part extend over a period of from three to five years.

The contest manager, with his 30 per cent, will walk out of town leaving this newspaper to hold the bag and wrestle with its problem.

The contestants will have their automobiles, cash prizes and percentage.

What a price to pay for the glory of so-called leadership.

The contest manager in this instance first went to the newspaper that had had no contests.

He was turned down.

He then went to the other newspaper and represented that its competitor was planning to put on a contest.

Fearful of losing his lead in circulation the manager closed with him at once so as to head off the other paper.

The other newspaper was then besieged by contest companies from every part of the country to let them put on a counter contest.

They were all turned down and the cut in price was resorted to.

Many newspapers are being victimized by these contest companies. Especially is this true in fields where there is keen rivalry between competing newspapers.

No one can claim that circulation obtained in this manner is real merit circulation that gives full value to advertisers.

Why then should not the A. B. C. discriminate in some way against it?

Why not segregate it as it does circulation in arrears?

Why should not the newspapers of the country, through the power of the A. B. C. protect their members from the crew of leeches that are fattening on newspaper revenues?

It seems to the writer that it is high time that the A. B. C. took as firm and comprehensive a stand on circulation ethics as it has on circulation accounting.

It is quite certain that the A. B. C. will take such a stand if its press membership takes the initiative.

MAJ. BERRY RE-ELECTED

All Intern'l Pressmen's Union Officers Retained without Opposition

All officials of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants Union of North America headed by Maj. George L. Berry, president, were re-elected without opposition it was announced at Pressmen's Home, Tenn., late last week.

President Berry said:

"The result of the unanimous re-election of the present administration by the membership of International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America manifests very clearly the confidence and satisfaction felt with respect to our policy of education, conciliation and arbitration.

"Our technical trade school development and our acceptance of the principles of conciliation and arbitration which has made for efficiency and peace in the industry, will be continued without reservation. The members of the organization, the employing printers and publishers of America have profited in fair proportions as the result of the application of this fine American policy, free, as it is, from all of the various 'isms' that are in conflict with genuine Americanism."

TYPE DRESS CHANGED ON N. Y. TIMES

Oculists Interviewed Endorse New Specially Designed Face, 6½ Point on 7 Slug—Results in Difference of Two Inches on a Column

The New York Times has changed its reading type from six point face on six and one-half slug, to six and one-half point on seven. The change was effected Jan. 5, and was advertised in other New York dailies Jan. 11. Type of the headlines has not been changed.

Adolph S. Ochs, publisher, originated the idea of improving the readability of the Times, and the type innovation followed several months of careful study and investigation directed by Lt. Col. Julius Ochs Adler, vice-president, and Hugh A. O'Donnell, assistant business manager.

The problem faced was to find a new type which would be easier to read, without being so large as to increase the bulk of the newspaper or to make omission of news necessary.

Mr. O'Donnell personally interviewed oculists in New York and elsewhere, showing them the old type and the proposed new face. Then a questionnaire was issued to 700 oculists on the subject. The majority of oculists, according to Mr. O'Donnell, endorsed the innovation. He quoted one noted oculist as saying:

"The proposed type is unquestionably more restful and distinct, and therefore advantageous to the reader and far preferable to the old type."

The mechanical department of the Times is equipped with 25 linotypes and 58 intertypes. New matrices were specially designed and cut for the typesetting machines by the Intertype Corporation.

"The new type uses very little more space," Charles I. Willey, day foreman of the Times composing room, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "We figure there is a difference of about two inches to a column."

According to J. W. Schuh, technical expert of the Intertype Corporation, the new type is called "Times Special, 6½ point, No. 2." It is now being supplied to newspaper publishers, he said, in italic and bold face in that size.

"The specially designed face," Mr. Schuh said, "was one of 25 which we furnished the Times, and the one which met the approval of oculists to whom the Times submitted it. The difference between the new and the old face is most noticeable under a glass. The new type is rounder and is therefore easier to read."

CLUB FAILS TO CENSOR NEWS IN TAMPA

Dailies Continue to Report Cases of Smallpox Despite Kiwanis Club Resolution—Support City Health Officer

Despite efforts of the local Kiwanis Club to suppress the news, newspapers of Tampa, Fla., are continuing to report smallpox cases in that city, thereby aiding the city health officer in his successful attempts to prevent an epidemic.

The Kiwanis Club went on record as being opposed to any publicity on the number of smallpox cases. A club committee, headed by Dr. W. M. Rowlett, member of the Florida medical board of examiners, was named to call on the newspaper publishers. This action was taken, it was stated, because Tampa was "getting unfair advertising through reports which are exaggerated by papers in the North."

The newspapers refused to heed the committee's demands and, while declaring there was no danger of epidemic, printed daily reports in order to aid health authorities combat the situation. In special telegrams to EDITOR & PUBLISHER replying to requests for information, Tampa editors outlined their stand. E. C. Levy, city health officer, also wired EDITOR & PUBLISHER that newspapers were co-operating with him "to the fullest extent."

D. B. McKay, publisher of the Tampa Daily Times, wired:

"There is no smallpox epidemic here, and no likelihood that there will be. There are less than 40 cases among the population of 160,00, mostly among negroes.

"The Kiwanis club passed a resolution asking newspapers to refrain from reporting cases, but all the papers in the city refused, and are giving the facts daily. Extensive vaccination will soon eradicate the disease."

E. D. Lambright, editor of the Tampa Tribune, said:

"The newspapers here declined to accede to the unwise request of the Kiwanis Club for suppression of smallpox news and have been printing full reports daily. The facts are also being given out to the Associated Press.

"The situation here is not in the least alarming with only 20 cases, and every precaution is being taken.

"The newspapers took the position that the attempted suppression would be more damaging than publication of the facts. There is no more smallpox here than in other cities of similar size."

T. G. Hallinan, managing editor of the Tampa Telegraph made the following statement: "Tampa newspapers have played smallpox news daily and in fact have overplayed it somewhat. An unusually efficient health officer, Dr. Levy, asked for prominence of news in order to prevent anything approaching an epidemic. The papers co-operated with him and as result word goes forth that an epidemic is raging here. Tampa and vicinity has a population of 160,000 and the smallpox cases are not more than three dozen to date."

Mr. Levy's telegram follows:

"There has been no actual suppression of facts by our Tampa newspapers, although efforts at suppression were made by a civic organization. Tampa has had nothing in any way approaching an epidemic and nothing which cannot be completely controlled by wholesale vaccination. All our efforts have been in this direction and publicity is of the utmost importance in getting consent of the people to be vaccinated.

"Our efforts are meeting with the most gratifying response on the part of physicians, employers and the general public. The situation is well in hand. There have been 43 cases in the past month, making the situation no different from what occurs each year in any number of American cities.

"I would repeat that our newspapers are co-operating to the fullest extent."

EUROPE TURNS TO NEWSPAPERS OF AMERICA

Growing Respect for Nation Reflected in New Interest in Technical Methods of U. S. Dailies, Says Dr. E. J. Bing, European Representative of United Press—"Isolation Policy" Becoming Appreciated Abroad

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

RELATIONS between European and American newspapers were this week described as a "picture in miniature" of the political and economic relationships between the two continents, by Dr. Edward J. Bing, general European representative of the United Press.

The United States policy of economic aid and political isolation is now becoming understood and appreciated abroad, Dr. Bing declared in an interview, resulting in a growing respect for this nation. Analogous to this, he said, there is an awakened interest on the part of European editors in the technical business, and advertising methods employed by the American press.

Dr. Bing, a native of Hungary, makes his European headquarters in Berlin. He arrived in this country via Paris, Jan. 7, to remain here about three weeks. An Oxford man, he is widely traveled, and speaks convincingly of the European situation. This is his second visit to this country.

"America's political isolation, coupled with its economic co-operation with European countries," he said, "is at least as important a peace factor as the Locarno pact.

"Europe today is looking to America as its economic saviour. The intellectual European now knows that he cannot count on this country entering the political arena of the continent. America, it is now thought, will not become a member of the League of Nations or any other European political group. The hope of any such alliance appears to be generally waning.

"On the other hand it is becoming recognized that America, far from trying to harm Europe, is helping and co-operating on a wide economic scale.

"In Europe there are still groups of countries hostile to each other; Poland, on the one hand, against Germany on the other; Hungary against Czecho Slovakia. These countries have not yet had time fully to enter into the spirit of Locarno, but all of them have become united in the common desire to co-operate economically with America. They realize that the astute American business man will not invest his money in a powder house, and, therefore, keep at peace in order to encourage American investment in their industries. One is more inclined to be peaceful when the pocket book suffers.

"The intelligent European is now coming to see that it is a good thing that America's relationship to his country is on a purely business basis. Should America mingle in European politics, it is reasoned, she would lose her wonderful neutrality, the backbone of respect for America and this country's prestige abroad. It is the American man of business who is looked up to abroad, the man who buys and sells for cash, rather than the man who plays high politics.

"Concomitant with the growing respect for America, it is to the American publisher as a business man, to whom the European editors are now turning as never before. Wherever I go abroad, I find American newspaper methods penetrating the European shops. European editors hitherto content with their own operating policies, are turning to America to study American methods of advertising, news transmission, distribution, and make-up.

"The European conception of a newspaper is of high standard. The Continental newspaper lays less stress on feature or comic, than on high-class articles, written by well paid authors. This conception has not changed, is not being Americanized; but American working methods, the speed of production, the technical side of the press, is being given careful consideration.

"Since Senator Paul Dupuy, proprietor of the Paris Petit Parisien returned from this country and openly professed he had learned a lot from the American newspapers, numerous widely known European editors have taken similar study tours. Dr. Key, chief editor of the Stockholm Svenska Dagbladet, and George Bernhard, of the Berlin Vossische Zeitung, are two who have been as unstinting in their praise as Senator Dupuy.

"About six years ago, the Stockholm Dagens Nyheter, a technically very conservative daily, suddenly decided to Americanize its front page. No one believed the experiment would result in success. But other European newspaper men who watched the test with interest, were treated to the surprise of their life, and their respect for newspapers of this country was increased."

The analogy between the political and economic relationships between America and the Continent, Dr. Bing pointed out, is most clearly illustrated in the headway the United Press, an American business organization, selling news as a commodity, has made abroad in the last five years.

"The United Press today," he continued, "is selling news in 15 different European countries, representing a total of about 45 newspapers. It was something new to the European editor to buy news on a business basis.

"Among U. P. clients abroad are newspapers of unique standing in their countries. To mention only a few, there are the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, the Frankfurter Zeitung, and the Barcelona Vanguardia.

"These newspapers, and others not as widely known, are refusing propaganda in the most energetic way. They look upon the United Press as preserving a neutrality similar to the neutrality of the American government. The average editor in Europe knows that the U. P. is keeping away from entangling alliances and agreements with subsidized news agencies of the Continent.

"The European newspaper reader during the war witnessed systematic pro-German and pro-Ally propaganda, and now evince a profound distrust in propaganda. Burned cats fear the fire.

"Our policy is to give facts, which we expect will be printed without coloring. We deliver a commodity on an economic basis. It is a picture in miniature of the relationship between America and Europe."

Dr. Bing visited Italy recently, and was asked to discuss Mussolini's drastic attitude toward the press.

"I would not venture to give my opinions on the subject," he said, "but I do feel qualified to present an impartial picture of the present situation in Italy.

"In Italy, two doctrines are at war, and one at present has the upper hand. The one on top, the Fascist party, is represented by Premier Mussolini.

"Mussolini believes that indiscriminate distribution of Italian news would undermine Italy's economic situation in the eyes of the world. He contends his opposition subordinates patriotism to their own selfish interests, and therefore suppresses their utterances.

"To this the anti-facists reply that fascism is dealing a death blow to freedom of the press, and Mussolini counters by declaring his opposition is rather seeking to cast him out than to champion the newspapers.

Dr. Bing entered the United Press service after a romantic European newspaper and war career. Among all newspaper men, he perhaps exclusively can claim authoritative right to the title of "Sheik." For a year he lived with a Bedouin tribe by which he was adopted.

During the war he was a captain in the Turkish army, and was awarded eight decorations. One of these is the Medjidieh, which gives him the title of Turkish Bey, corresponding to a British baronet.

Ever since he was 17 years old, Dr. Bing has been in newspaper work. In 1913 and 1914, while on the staff of the Az Est, a Hungarian evening newspaper, he reported the Ulster riots in Ireland. He became associated with the United Press in 1919. In July of that year he was able through unique enterprise to furnish the outside world with the first authentic interview with Lenine. From Hungary he wirelessed questions to Lenine in Moscow, receiving reply the same way. He followed this with a similar wireless interview with Trotsky. He has interviewed in person Arch Duke Joseph, Caliph Abdul Medjid, deposed in 1923, and Mustapha Kemal Pasha, the present president of the Turkish government.

Dr. Bing's first interview with Mustapha Kemal Pasha took place under unusual circumstances. The present president of the country, then fighting for power, was completely cut off from all outside communication. To reach him, Dr. Bing organized a courier service by which his questions were carried and replies returned.

Dr. Edward J. Bing

"From a study of Continental and American newspapers, it is my opinion that whereas the former overrate, the latter are inclined to underestimate the intelligence of their readers.

"The American tendency is particularly true among editors of the Middle West, I believe. There editors seem to me too inclined to think their readers mentally cramped and provincial."

MR. OCHS' ADDRESS

THE address on advertising delivered by Adolph S. Ochs, publisher New York Times, on Jan. 6, at the Advertising Club of New York, and reported in these columns last week, has been printed in booklet form, with revisions correcting stenographic errors, and is available at the New York Times office and at the club, it is announced.

PROTEST RADIO ADVERTISING

British Newspapers Oppose News Dissemination Also

Uncontrolled broadcasting of news, the use of radio for advertising, and the utilisation of broadcasting for propaganda or party purposes, are opposed by the proprietors of British newspapers in a joint memorandum submitted to the Committee of Enquiry now sitting to consider the future of broadcasting in Great Britain.

At present the British Broadcasting Company is not allowed to transmit news before 7 p. m. but in a statement to the committee, the company suggested that this limitation should be removed. Press contention is that reasonable public requirements are met by the existing arrangements.

The second conclusion presented is "that from all points of view it is undesirable and unnecessary to utilize the broadcaster for advertising purposes." Thirdly, "adequate safeguards must be imposed to prevent the broadcaster from being used for propaganda or party purposes, and that the final decision in such matters should not rest with a government department or a Minister of the Crown."

TO SURVEY STATE BUREAUS

Olympia (Wash.) Olympian to Analyse Various Departments

The Morning Olympian, published in Olympia, Wash., the State capital, and edited by Fred B. Judges, has announced that it will print a series of signed and copyrighted articles offering a clear and analytical study of State Government. The various State departments will be thoroughly surveyed and the results they achieve will be balanced against operating costs.

"The publication will offer allegiance to no cause other than the truth and to no faction whatsoever," says the editor in launching his new policy. "In the news columns there will be offered nothing but news, based on definitely demonstrable facts. Interpretive and analytical studies will all be duly credited as to source and authorship."

New Lets Air Mail Contract

Postmaser General New this week awarded to Charles Dickinson, of Chicago, the contract for carrying the United States mails by air from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis, via Milwaukee and LaCrosse, Wis. Dickinson will begin operation just as soon as he has equipped his landing fields. He is to receive 48 per cent. of the revenue derived in carrying the mails. Dickinson has three planes.

Wilson Leaves Easton Free Press

Frank B. Wilson, co-publisher and owner of a third interest in the Easton (Pa.) Free Press and secretary and treasurer of the Free Press Publishing Company, has severed his active connections with the paper. He retains his one-third interest.

MORE BIG 1925 LINAGE GAINS REPORTED BY MANY NEWSPAPERS

Increased Use of Paid Space in Instances Amounts to Millions of Agate Lines—Revised List of Leaders in Three Fields

EDITOR & PUBLISHER herewith presents revised lists of 1925 newspaper advertising linage records, including additional returns from many cities.

In last week's publication of 1925 linage figures several six-day newspapers were accidentally classified with papers having 13 issues per week.

Here are revised figures of newspapers reporting up to press time.

RECORD NEW YORK LINAGE IN 1925

NEW YORK newspapers showed an advertising gain of 8,151,172 lines in 1925, printing a total of 167,831,296 lines as compared with 159,680,124 lines in 1924, according to figures just issued by the Statistical Department of the New York Evening Post.

The 1925 figure is the record New York lineage to date, the nearest approach having been recorded in 1923 with a total of 160,425,514 lines.

NEWS MEN AID MAYOR

George Van Slyke, New York Sun, Picked Police Commissioner

To George Van Slyke, political editor of the New York Sun, goes full credit for picking the present police commissioner of New York, George McLaughlin, according to a public announcement made by Mayor James J. Walker.

Day after day city hall reporters were asking the mayor-elect whom he intended to make his police chief. They obtained no satisfaction. One day he frankly confessed he didn't know.

"Well," said Van Slyke, "why not offer the job to George McLaughlin, state banking commissioner?"

"Fine!" Mayor Walker is said to have replied, "He's the very man I want. I never thought of him before."

The offer was subsequently made, and, after several days consideration, Mr. McLaughlin accepted. Then Mayor Walker announced publicly full credit for the choice was due to the news man.

Van Slyke met McLaughlin in Albany while covering news of the state legislature for the Sun. He has been writing politics in New York for about 16 years. Before joining the staff of the Sun, he was with the old New York Herald.

NEWARK NEWS CAMPAIGN TAUGHT PUBLIC HOW TO BURN SOFT COAL

Lessons Inaugurated by Daily Relieved Hardships and Won Praise of City Commissioner—Sinnott Named Managing Editor

WITH the anthracite coal strike conference broken off this wek in New York, newspaper attention turns toward the enterprise of the Newark Evening News, which, under the editorship of Edward W. Scudder, originated a system of soft coal demonstration stations, that, widely copied by other newspapers, has materially curbed hardship among householders in the East. Arthur J. Sinnott is managing editor.

ARTHUR J. SINNOTT

An estimate of the worth of the Evening News' quick action in the early days of the strike was made the other day by Commissioner Murray of Newark, who declared that had the daily made a cash donation of $50,000 to relieve conditions among the poor due to the strike, it would not have equaled the amount of good accomplished by the educational campaign in the use of the soft coal substitute.

Newark, a city of half a million, close to the anthracite region, had never had to use soft fuel. By November effects of the strike began to be felt there. There was plenty of soft coal, the handling of which was unknown.

Officials of the News decided it was a newspaper's duty to assist its readers in learning how to burn soft coal and began a systematized effort to relieve the discomfort and distress which became manifest with the approaching cold weather. The idea of establishing demonstration stations was carried to Commissioner Murray and gained his immediate support.

It was agreed that the city would arrange stations at convenient points and appoint instructors in use of the substitute, while the Evening News would supply the soft coal for demonstration purposes and furnish the necessary publicity.

The campaign was begun, therefore, by publication by the News of a carefully prepared and complete list of local dealers equipped to meet the public demand for soft fuel; a list of stations where instruction in its use might be obtained free, and the first of a series of informative articles telling the story of soft coal. The campaign was put in charge of John C. Phillipps of the Evening News staff.

The enterprise was popular at the start. Spreading first to Newark suburbs, it was taken up by other newspapers throughout the State, in New York, and elsewhere.

At one time there were 75 demonstration stations, usually in fire houses, in operation in and around Newark furnishing instruction to 90 householders each a day in three different sessions. This number dwindled as furnace tenders of the city learned how to keep their fires going with the substitute. But many stations are still in operation.

Other relief measures were instituted in Newark. Results of the Evening News campaign, however, were evidenced in the fact that the number of some 500 destitute families applying daily for free coal early in the strike has now been cut down to three or four a day.

"It has completely solved the coal problem in this city of 500,000," Commissioner Murray has been quoted as saying.

In addition to running daily articles, prominently played, the News had thousands of cards printed to be placed near stoves and furnaces, telling how to burn the soft fuel.

Because of its conciseness and comprehensiveness, EDITOR & PUBLISHER prints the complete text of this card for the benefit of editors planning similar campaigns. The text, under the heading, "This is the Way to Burn Soft Coal," follows:

How to Start: Open all the drafts. Lay the kindlings just as if you had anthracite. You may even use less kindlings. Put in a layer of about as much soft coal as you would anthracite. Light the fire. Let it get well caught. Add a little more coal.

How to Regulate: When the fire is going good, close the bottom draft tight, but check slightly the damper in the smoke pipe or chimney draft. You might tinker a little with the chimney draft, but never close the chimney draft tight.

Keep this vent open: To aid combustion and to burn off gases always have the air vent in the fire door open a little. Keep the fire box a little more than half full. This gives the most economical results. Leave a small opening when putting fuel on the fire, of uncovered well-burned coal. This is the "hot spot" of bright fire intended to insure the burning of the gases released by the coal, which will make the fire better and eliminate smoke. Lay the coal on the fire; don't spread it.

Don't break coke on top: To hold the fire during the day, don't break the coke on top. To get a quick, hot fire break the coke at the front with a stout poker, pry the mass to loosen it and open wide all drafts.

To bank for night: In banking the fire for the night, cover with sufficient coal. Leave all drafts open except the ash pit, which must be kept closed.

Rake, but don't shake: Rake gently, instead of shaking as violently as with anthracite. Always leave plenty of ash on the grate bars.

This guide is part of a systematized effort to relieve discomfort and distress due to the hard coal shortage, in which the city of Newark and various suburban municipalities co-operate with the Newark Evening News.

John P. Maynard, former managing editor, has been made associate editor of the Evening News, and succeeded by Arthur J. Sinnott, for 12 years Washington correspondent.

Mr. Sinnott returned from Washington to Newark last July as assistant managing editor. Robert R. Lane, formerly Washington editorial writer, is now correspondent. Mr. Maynard assumed his new duties early last month, following a return from a long vacation abroad.

The two editorial executives have been colleagues together on the News for many years. Both started as reporters for that paper. Prior to becoming Washington correspondent, Mr. Sinnott was for four years city editor of the News. He had a splendid record in Washington. During the war, he was sent abroad by the Government on a special secret mission. In addition to being a newspaper man, he is also a lawyer, having been admitted to the New Jersey bar in 1913.

Mr. Maynard started on the News as a reporter in 1894. His first desk position was that of suburban editor, from which he worked up through assistant city editor, city editor, and managing editor.

Smith Succeeds Kirkendall

Col. Ernest G. Smith has been elected president and editor of the Wilkes-Barre (Pa.) Times-Leader, succeeding the late Fred C. Kirkendall. F. C. Kirkendall, Jr., has been named secretary of the company and an associate editor. Wesley E. Woodruff is also associate editor.

DUPLEX PRESS FIRM PLANS EXPANSION

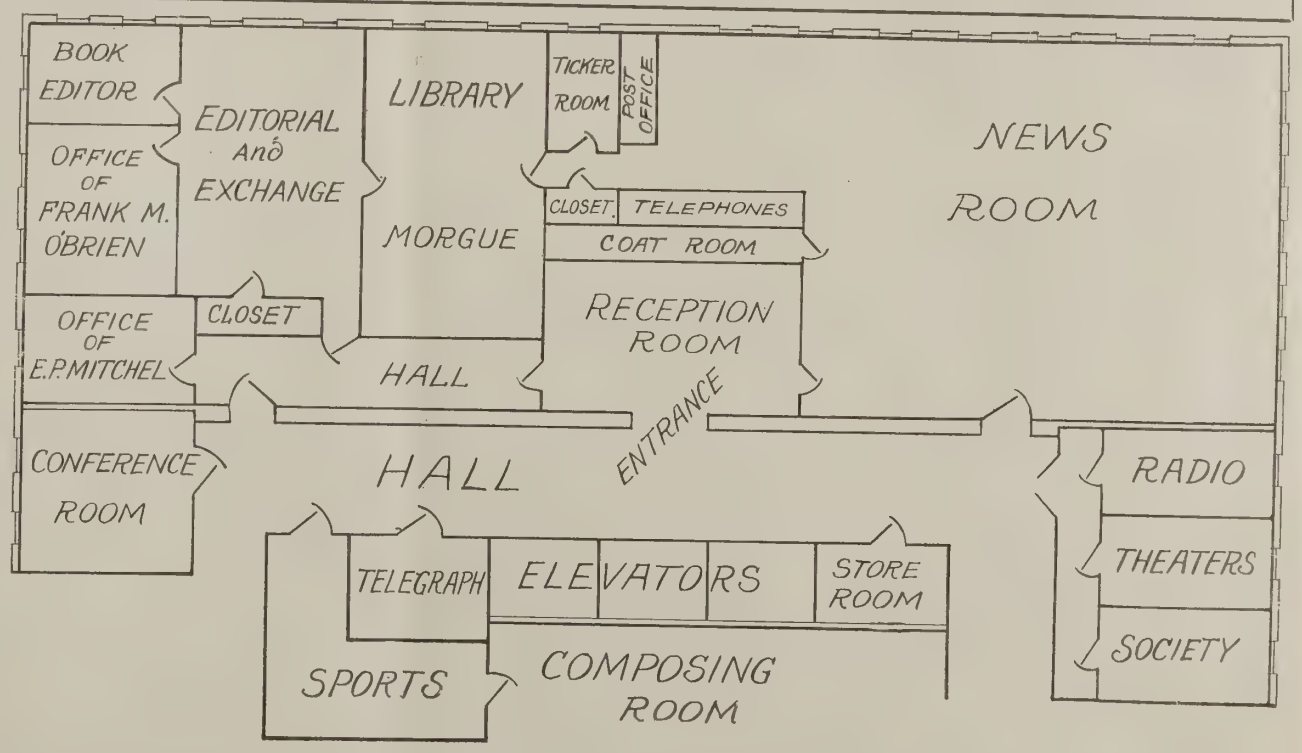
Contemplated Building Program Would Increase Factory Floor Space 50 Per Cent at Cost of $150,000

A building expansion program to include the increasing of floor space in the new factory building erected a little over four years ago by 50 per cent, and the installation of a large amount of new machinery and equipment is at present being considered by officials of the Duplex Printing Press Company.

I. K. Stone, president of the company, said in discussing the program, that the proposal to expand is merely contemplated so far.

"We have had plans prepared and bids have been submitted, but we have not reached a final decision to build," he stated.

"It can be said that if such decision is reached, it will come during the present year and will bring a great expansion of our manufacturing facilities.



"We have let no contracts so far, pending the reaching of such decision. If we decide to build, it will mean a probable minimum expenditure for plant and equipment of $150,000 and will be followed by a material increase in the number of our employes."

The main and newest factory building of the Duplex company's plant, which it is proposed to enlarge in contemplated plans, will furnish the pattern for the new addition, Mr. Stone says.

U. P. Adds to Illinois Circuit

Five additional newspapers have been added to the Illinois printer circuit operated by the United Press, it was announced this week at New York headquarters. They are the Harrisburg Register, Robinson News, Lawrenceville Record, Marion Post, and West Frankfort American.

NEW YORK SUN REMODELLING EDITORIAL ROOM

USING plans drawn up under the direction of William T. Dewart, president, and Keats Speed, managing editor of the New York Sun, work started this week on alteration of the news and editorial rooms of that newspaper, throwing open for exclusive use of the Sun the old city room of the New York Herald.

Increased speed and efficiency is expected to follow, Mr. Speed said. Departments now scattered will be united in one big room and the sporting department will be housed in a separate office close to the composing room.

The floor plan, pictured above, provides a 30 by 30 foot addition to the Sun's news room, making it measure approximately 56 by 44 feet.

Entrance to the various editorial departments will be through a new reception room, measuring 28 by 17 feet. The Herald's former city room has been divided into private offices for editorial writers and executives, space for an exchange department, and increased space for the library and the morgue.

The Sun now runs eight editions daily, which increases to nine during big sport seasons. The news staff numbers 64, exclusive of the sporting department, which has its own staff of 12. There are six editorial writers.

TRAIL BLAZERS OF ADVERTISING

Waiting In Line For Land Opening

CHAPTER XIX

Waiting in Line for Land Opening

WHEN publicity was given to the valuable farms in the Yuma, Ariz., irrigation project open to entry, I, like hundreds of others in Los Angeles at that time, decided I wanted to get a farm. Advertising of the wildest sort made thousands to want to go back to the land.

Eleven days before the date of entry a line of would-be homesteaders began to form on the sidewalk in front of the Chamber of Commerce in Los Angeles. This line, which numbered about two hundred, was supposed to be official. The police department gave out numbers and we believed there would be no chance of any one getting in ahead of us.

With eleven days before us to wait, the first night was a novel sensation and very exciting. Grouped and huddled about oil stoves, for this was in February and the nights were cold, our little crowd of entrymen patiently sat wrapped in blankets and comforts and waited for the dawn.

Naturally as Broadway, the main thoroughfare of Los Angeles, became deserted of curious spectators we drew closer together and all became thoroughly acquainted. Some were seated in rocking chairs, others on camp chairs, boxes and cushions, and we whiled away the hours, reading, telling stories and playing cards. The fact that there were yet ten days to hold the places did not seem to worry this band of ambitious land owners. The principal topic of discussion was the widely advertised rich, fertile lands on which we all hoped to enter. However by the next morning the enthusiasm began to cool down and many of us were thankful when we were told it would not be necessary to remain in line for the entire eleven days. Some refused to leave and began to arrange with friends and relatives to relieve them long enough to get food and sleep.

The first place was held by a dry goods clerk, second and third by a couple of painters, fourth by a dentist's wife, etc. The line was made up of people from all walks of life—artists, bakers, writers, real estate dealers, stenographers, railroad men and but few farmers. No matter what his or her occupation might have been each one intended to become a farmer at once. It was unanimously agreed that true happiness was to be found only on a little Yuma farm with chickens, bees and a garden.

The first man in line was offered $500 for his place but he would not sell because he had determined to become a farmer.

Trouble began when a carload of people came in from Arizona and complained that the line was unfair. They said they would form another line and get a square deal. The police notified them that another line would be broken up. Next the Los Angeles merchants protested that the line interfered with business, and so the line was transferred from the main thoroughfare to a back street.

It was a strange spectacle—the long line of men and women—staggering under camp chairs, great piles of comforters, oil stoves and lunch baskets, marching in single file behind two tall policemen. On the new ground they were lined up in the same order as they were on Broadway and were soon settled again. At this station brokerage of the tickets furnished by the police became very spirited; ticket 41, which secured the forty-first selection of the farms, was sold for $100. Other tickets were sold for $50, $75, and $90. The police could not prevent the buying and selling of the tickets. Even with all the gambling in tickets, the line was remarkably orderly.

The would-be farmers had agreed upon a code of rules for the holding of their places in line, and this was religiously observed without the aid of the police. Each of the "linemen" was entitled to be absent from his post with no one in his place for 10 minutes at a time. In addition to this the "linemen" might be absent without a substitute for a period of 45 minutes twice every 12 hours.

At the beginning of the third day a bomb was exploded in the little group of home seekers. A telegram came from the Land Office at Washington, saying that the people in line would have no advantage over late entries. They were told that the numbers they held would be disregarded. The disappointing order to break up the line came in a down-pour of rain. After waiting 48 hours and being drenched by the rain this band of land-seekers would not give up.

The next step was to hire a hall and band together to fight it out. The orders from the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, meant that it would be a waste of time for a man of meager resources to seek to become the possessor of one of the Yuma farms. The old form of lottery drawing ha been discarded. The new plan required registeration and filing 20 days later, after which the land would be sold to the highest bidder who had previously filed on this particular farm.

"No chance for a poor man in this," said a paper-hanger in line. "The new deal will be great for speculators, who can hire men to bid in the land for them and send them to Yuma to work on wages until the title of the real owners can be safely recorded. I am a poor man, with just enough to make the first payment, and I had hoped to earn enough money from one of the other farms to make the other payments."

The others in line were as completely crushed as this man. The dreams which had cheered them through 48 hours of waiting had not then drifted far en away but what some of their filmy substance lingered within range of the mind's eye. It took some time for them to understand the unexpected order. They could not be made to realize that it would be only by the merest chance that any man or woman could obtain one of the 173 Yuma farms on the terms first announced by the Land Office authorities.

Some of the disappointed home-seekers deserted the line when they saw what they had believed to be an opportunity to establish themselves in life and make a modest fortune torn suddenly from them. Others, undismayed by the orders to disperse, formed an organization for mutual protection and rented a store room where the line was to be maintained, but suddenly it disappeared just as mysteriously as it had been formed.

When the widely advertised Yuma land opening—the last Indian land opening in the West—took place March 1, it was robbed of the picturesque setting that had attended all previous openings.

Chalmers L. Pancoast, author of this series, with gun and horse on the wide-open ranges in the early days in the West.

About 100 would-be homesteaders remained all night outside the auditorium —where the drawing took place—seated on the cement steps or rolled up in blankets in the gutters of the street. This crowd numbered many of the land-seekers in the Yuma line which had formed on the main street 11 days previous. It might have been a Sunday School convention for all the excitement that prevailed. With 173 farms under the Yuma reclamation project as the grand prizes in the land lottery, 2,900 persons quietly filed into the large auditorium and took seats for the qualifying around in the drawing contest. It was as orderly a gathering as anyone could wish. Cards were distributed to each person in the hall. Every person more than 21 years old, who was a native-born citizen, or who had declared his intention of becoming a citizen, might register. The name, address, height, age, etc., had to be written out fully. After the blanks were collected the doors were unlocked. Each person was given a coupon, detached from the printed blank. Up to March 20 this coupon might be presented at the local land office, and the person presenting it was entitled to file on one of the 173 forty acre farms. Each person registering was made to understand that any applications filed as late as March 20 would have the same standing as those filed March 1.

This regulation prevented a rush and any kind of disorder. If, when the applications were opened after March 20, there happened to be a farm for which there was only one applicant that piece of land would go to that individual upon payment of $65 an acre in installments covering a period of ten years or less, and by living on the land five years to make final proof. If there were two or more applicants for the same farm, these applications were looked upon simultaneously and this farm was sold to the highest bidder among the applicants for that particular farm. No fees were required until it was finally determined who would get that particular piece of land.

Thus the last land rush in the far Southwest was a very quiet and sane affair—quite different from the old days in Oklahoma and the mad cross country rush on horse back, in buckboards and on foot to reach the reservation limits. However, the last land drawing required as careful planning on the part of the Government as the maddest scramble which ever took place on the Indian Reservation.

CHAPTER XX

The Original Street Sign Worker

DAY before yesterday in the advertising game there were many men whose business in life was largely a matter of taking a chance. It is now a business more of changes than chances, because progress requires constant change; but of the times chronicled here the slogan of the advertising adventurer was "Take a chance."

As a tacker of signs on telegraph poles and barns, a house-to-house passer of hand-bills, as a performer of other parts played in the game, advertising had been a matter of hard work and little pay.

Then I caught the spirit of adventure and romance, and began to see color as I drifted across the pathways of the clever advertising men of that time.

I had met a stroller whose business card read, "Advertising Expert." He had a charm of personality. He was full of ideas and schemes. He stood out as a romantic character and appealed strongly to my untamed imagination.

As a reporter on a small town newspaper he sought me out. He came to town dead broke. He didn't want money. He just wanted to meet the editor of the paper.

His scheme was to put an advertising sign, or directory of leading firms, on the principal street corners in town. In reality there were only two. He went only the limit. In exchange for printing the cards the newspaper was to receive the most prominent space.

With a contract from the newspaper he next called on the local hardware merchant and gave him a free space for furnishing frames and glass for the signs. Another of these valuable spaces for advertising was traded to the boarding house keeper for his board. He then sold the nine remaining spaces to the leading local druggist, cigar shop, harness shop, restaurant, jewelry store, tailor shop, book store and shoe shop for $10 each.

Only the leading merchants were invited to be represented in this exclusive advertising scheme. They fell for the idea quickly, yet these same merchants had to be begged year in and year out to donate a little space to support the local newspaper.

A schemer with some contest or puzzle to make the public gamble could hit town and clean up. But a legitimate worker went begging and regular newspaper space was sold on the idea of civic pride or of helping a newspaper to keep alive and stay in town.

This promoter of the street corner sign had something new and different. He cleaned up quickly without spending a cent on the transaction. He was a taker of chances; but he was a great talker and a quick "closer." He had to close or go hungry. Desperation has made star salesmen out of bums.

That stunt has always stood out in my memory as a striking publicity stunt. No one but an advertising adventurer would ever think of starting a business with absolutely nothing but nerve and talk, and in a few days time have money enough to travel opulently on to the next town.

Lines of Total Advertising

Printed by The Detroit News in 1925

Due to its singularly thorough coverage of the Detroit field—a feat unequalled by any other newspaper in any other city of Detroit's size or larger—The Detroit News not only once more assumed ranking position among the metropolitan newspapers of America in total advertising but also exceeded its 1924 record by 2,761,976 lines. In the local field The Detroit News leads all other media in total, local, national and classified advertising as well as in every other selling classification of advertising.

EUROPEAN PRESS APPROVES LEAGUE PLAN FOR WORLD PRESS MEET

Responses from Journalists and Associations Obtained by Editor & Publisher Indicate High Interest Abroad—Problems Outlined

THE League of Nations has published the following responses from journalists and press organizations in nations that are members of the League, to the proposal of the Chilian delegate, M. Yanez, that a committee of press experts meet at Geneva, possibly during the coming summer, for the purpose of discussing improved means of news communication and public information, looking to better international understanding and consequent peace:

AUSTRIA. M. Ludwig, Director of the Press Bureau of the Federal Chancellory, pronounces in favor of convening a committee of this kind. In his opinion the purpose of holding such a meeting would not be to ask the press to offer its services to the League of Nations, but to give the latter an opportunity of playing the part of international intermediary in press questions which it has already so usefully performed in other directions. M. Ludwig considers that most of the questions which would be discussed by a committee of press experts would principally concern newspaper proprietors.

BELGIUM. M. Vandervelde, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and M. Paul Hymans, Belgian Representative on the Council, have informed the Secretary-General that the Assembly's resolution received favorable consideration at a meeting of the Belgian Press Association. The meeting expressed the opinion that the League of Nations could usefully negotiate between the different countries a uniform system of reduced rates for telephonic, telegraphic and railway communications.

BRITISH EMPIRE. The Secretariat has received replies from the Newspaper Proprietors' Association (London press), the Empire Press Union, the Newspaper Society (Provincial press) and the Institute of Journalists. The National Union of Journalists has promised a reply shortly.

The Newspaper Proprietors' Association considered the Assembly resolution at one of the meetings of its Council. The latter, while of the opinion that a reduction of telegraph and telephone rates and the improvement of communications are a matter of urgent interest, decided to postpone giving a definite opinion on the scheme until it was in possession of more detailed and concrete information.

The Executive Committee of the Newspaper Society replied that it is inclined to look favorably upon the proposal, but wishes to postpone giving a final opinion until the other British press organizations have expressed views.

The Council of the Institute of Journalists states that it is ready to fall in with any effort to promote the organization of peace. It points out that previous experience has shown the difficulty of securing an adequate representation of the world press.

Certain leading figures in the press world have raised the question whether the League could help in considering the problem of applying the principle of industrial and commercial patent rights to press news, and have expressed the hope that the experts of the proposed press committee could meet and consider this question.

ESTHONIA. The Esthonian Journalists' Association expresses its readiness to co-operate to the best of its ability in organizing universal peace.

FINLAND. The Finnish Press Bureau, on behalf of the Finnish Press Associations, expresses itself in favor of the convening of a committee of press experts. It draws attention to the importance of a reduction of press telegraphic rates, and emphasizes the desirability of organizing tours for journalists abroad and establishing scholarships in journalism.

FRANCE. The chairman of the Executive Committee of the French Press states that the French Press welcomes the idea of convening a committee of experts. He adds that the representatives of the French Press consider that it might be premature, and would certainly be a matter requiring careful handling, to set up an organization on a practical footing capable of making an effective contribution to the establishment and maintenance of peace. On the other hand, they regard it as highly important that newspaper editors should be brought into contact for the purpose of studying common professional interests and more particularly of ensuring rapid communication, for that purpose they consider a reduction should be made in the press rates both for travel and for telephonic and telegraphic messages.

ITALY. The Italian Press appears very anxious to obtain improvements in the telegraphic, radio-telegraphic, telephonic and radio-telephonic services and to secure reduction in rates.

ROUMANIA. The Director of the Roumanian Press Bureau, M. Diano, writes that the Roumanian Press regards the convening of a committee of press experts as desirable and useful, and hopes that the press of the Little Entente may be able to render valuable services to the cause of peace.

KINGDOM OF THE SERBS, CROATS AND SLOVENES. M. Ivkovitch, Director of the Press Bureau, states he fully support the proposal. He adds that the press in his country is willing to take part in this work.

SWITZERLAND. Replying on behalf of the Swiss Press Association and the Swiss Newspaper Editors' Association M. E. Rietmann says that the League of Nations would be doing most valuable work if it were able, through its technical services, to convene an international conference to consider the reduction of news rates.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA. M. Hajek, Director of the Czecho-Slovak Press Bureau, says the Czecho-Slovak Press organizations regard the convening of a committee of press experts as highly desirable, and consider the Council of the League the most appropriate body to convene such a committee. He thinks that the committee should include representatives not merely of professional journalists' associations but also of newspaper owners and editors, of agencies and of official press bureaus.

The Secretariat communicated with the Conference of Telegraphic News Agencies (held at Rome from Oct. 26 to 31) and M. Meynot, head of the Havas Agency, informed the Secretary-General of the League of Nations that all the speakers recognized the importance of the proposal. They felt that the League could not but assist the international press in its work of extending its news services both in its own interests and for the benefit of its readers. The convening of a committee of press experts of the various continents might and should, they thought, have two results:

1. That of improving the mutual relations between the directing staff of the international press by bringing them into closer contact. This mutual understanding would inevitably promote the cause of peace which is the primary object of the League of Nations;

2. That of furthering, by the fullest possible discussion, the preparation of a common program, or the drawing up of recommendations or resolutions designed to facilitate the work of the international press, particularly by securing improved facilities for communication, by taking steps to ensure the secrecy of radio-telegraphic and even radio-telephonic messages, and by the recognition of property rights in information of all kinds, whether as literary or as industrial or commercial property.

The Conference of Agencies at Rome accordingly adopted a resolution deciding, should it receive an invitation to be represented on the committee of press experts referred to in the Assembly resolution, to accept that invitation.

DEFENSES FILED

Woods and Imrie Reply to Campbell's Suit vs. Canadian Press

The action of Charles E. Campbell, publisher of the Edmonton Bulletin, against the Canadian Press, J. H. Woods, editor and managing director of the Calgary Herald, vice-president of the Edmonton Journal and president of the Canadian Press, and John M. Irvine, managing director of the Edmonton Journal, for conspiracy to prevent the Bulletin from obtaining a wire service, has advanced another stage with the filing of defences by the three defendants in the Supreme Court of Alberta.

The Bulletin, in announcing this, states the case will be heard about Feb. 15.

Crown Willamette Gets Delaware Charter to Merge with Maine Firm

The Crown Willamette Paper Company, largest Pacific Coast Paper Manufacturer, was incorporated in Delaware this week to take over the assets of the Crown Willamette Paper Company of Maine and 91 per cent of the common stock of the Pacific Mills Ltd., of British Columbia.

Properties of the new company include five plants in Washington, Oregon, California and British Columbia with a daily capacity of 860 tons of finished papers, of which 650 are newsprint and the balance wrapping paper and tissue.

Work on Newsprint Mill Started

Manitoba's first newsprint mill, now under erection at Fort Alexander by the Manitoba Pulp and Paper Company, subsidiary of the Spanish River Pulp and Paper Company, at a cost of $1,000,000 is to be completed before the end of the year, as the company has undertaken to suppy paper by that date. The contract for the erection of the plant was recently let to a firm of Winnipeg contractors and about 700 men will be employed.

Another year of achievement

THE AVERAGE Daily and Sunday circulation of The New York Times in 1925 was over 385,000 — greater than any other regular morning newspaper in New York.

The present net paid circulation of the daily edition averages more than 360,000 and of the Sunday edition over 600,000. This circulation represents the largest group of intelligent readers ever assembled by one newspaper.

The New York Times interests and appeals to those who wish to keep fully informed on the news events throughout the world. Its circulation, therefore, embraces the highest quality of discriminating readers.

The volume of advertising in The Times — 28,200,444 agate lines in 1925—sets a new high record for New York City, exceeding the total of 1924 by 1,916,520 lines. The margin by which The Times led the second newspaper—10,963,382 lines—also sets a new record.

More significant than the unprecedented volume of advertising was its character. Advertisements offered for publication in The New York Times are subject to censorship to protect readers from false, misleading or questionable announcements. Thousands of lines of advertisements were rejected because they did not conform to its standards and ideals of a newspaper's obligations to the public.

LEADING EDITORS OF NATION MEETING IN WASHINGTON THIS WEEK

American Society of Newspaper Editors Convenes for Fourth Annual Convention at New Willard Hotel—Yost's Address Opens Gathering

EDITOR & PUBLISHER SERVICE

A FULL report of the proceedings of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, in session as EDITOR & PUBLISHER goes to press this week, will be published in this paper next week. Individuals or organizations desiring extra copies should apply in advance of Thursday, Jan. 21.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 15.—The opening session of the fourth annual meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors opened today at the New Willard Hotel. The convention will continue today and tomorrow. The first event of the meeting was the annual address of the President, Casper S. Yost, of St. Louis Globe-Democrat. This was to be followed by committee reports and routine business.

Wilmott Harsant Lewis, Washington correspondent of London Times, was scheduled to address the society this afternoon on the subject, "The Political Job of Old World Newspapers and How They Do It." Another address on the card for the day is by William Hard, taking as his topic "Are Newspapers Doing Their Political Job, and What is It?" Olin W. Kennedy, managing editor of Miami (Fla.) Herald will lead an open forum on "Wire Problems."

Following is the program for tomorrow:

10 a. m.—"What a University President sees in the Newspapers," Dr. George Barton Cutten, president, Colgate University.

Open forum—"Governing the City—in the State," led by George B. Armstead, managing editor Hartford Courant; "The Editorial-Advertising Space Problem," led by Walter Harrison, managing editor Oklahoma City Oklahoman.

Afternoon.—"Have Editorials Lost Their Influence?" William Allen White, editor Emporia Gazette.

Business Session—Election of directors.

Evening, 7 p. m.—Annual dinner.

A number of important matters are schedules for discussion, one of which may be the evil portent of press agentry. The Society may also make some announcement in regard to its action, two years ago, in reference to the "oil scandals."

STRONG DEFINES DUTIES OF A NEWSPAPER

New Chicago Daily News Publisher Says It Must Interest Every Member of Family and Strengthen Public Conscience

The modern metropolitan newspaper because of new standards largely set up by the late Victor F. Lawson, is now a quasi-public institution with definite obligations to its community in the opinion of Walter A. Strong, new publisher of the Chicago Daily News. Mr. Strong revealed his attitude towards his new responsibilities in a luncheon address at the City Club, Chicago, Jan. 12.

"It is not often understood," said Mr. Strong, "that the reading matter published in the daily newspapers occupies 90 per cent of the reading time of most individuals given to reading of any kind, and 100 per cent of the reading time of 75 per cent of the population of a city like Chicago."

"A newspaper must be in one sense a member of the family," he continued. "It must have in it something which interests every member of the family. It must begin its contact with the children, grow up with them and at the same time be accepted by the parents of those children —and their fathers and mothers—as a reliable source of information with respect to news of all kinds and a helpful contribution to the sum of demands for stories, humor, educational, religious and cultural influences which go to make up the life of our average American family."

As "a member of the family" a newspaper must "throw the light of publicity upon the acts of our public officials and upon the current events affecting great industrial, agricultural and labor movements," Mr. Strong went on to say. "In a large measure this publicity has built up and strengthened public conscience.

"You often hear it said that even so short a time as twenty years ago many things could have been done which today would not be permitted in public life or in business. One has to have confidence in the mass mind—in the right thinking of the American public—in the fact that, given enough time, we finally arrive at a higher level in the conduct of public affairs."

"Unless a newspaper enlists its power in the direction of public service, it cannot justify its existence," Mr. Strong declared.

"Right now," he said, "the Chicago newspaper faces the task of co-operating in the rebuilding of the city in preparation for the future."

"It will take courage and vision," he said, "to break the barriers that now hedge the city's growth. Yes, and it will take understanding and concessions."

He paid tribute to the late Victor Lawson, after explaining that he felt some sense of presumption at assuming so soon to take Mr. Lawson's place in the administration of the great newspaper which he established and administered as a public trust for so many years.

COL. FEAMSTER SELLS

Benjamin Harlow Now Sole Owner of Lexington (Va.) Gazette

Col. Claud N. Feamster last week sold his one-third interest in the Lexington (Va.) Gazette to Benjamin Harlow who now owns all stock in the paper.

Col. Feamster, a graduate of Washington and Lee University, became editor and part owner of the Gazette on Jan. 1, 1925. Mr. Harlow, a printer, will assume active management of the Gazette. This week the paper began its one hundred and twenty-second year of publication.

New Plan to Check Wood Exports

Hon. John Hall Kelly, member of the Legislative Council of Quebec, who has up to the present time been an opponent of any embargo on the export of pulpwood from Canada, in a speech in the Quebec Legislature on Jan. 8, suggested a compromise. Under the laws of Quebec, of course, wood may not be exported from Crown lands. The only question therefore relates to exports from privately owned lands. Up to the present time a colonist is not permitted to export wood cut on his lot until he has secured a patent on the lot; he may then do as he pleases with the wood. Mr. Kelly's suggestion is that all future patents issued should provide that the wood cut should not be exported in the raw state. This would thus gradually dry up the exports.

CANADIAN BILL HITS SECRET OWNERSHIP

Demands Names of Publishers of Organs Designed to Influence Public Opinion Be Filed with Post-Office Department

Designed as a death-blow to the "secret" publication of matter tending to influence public opinion, the second bill to be brought before Canada's fifteenth Parliament received its first reading in Ottawa, Jan. 11.

The bill was originally introduced last February by T. L. Church, M. P., as an amendment to the Post Office Act, but at the instance of the Postmaster General was held over to the present session pending further investigation.

The new legislation seks to remove secrecy as to the ownership and control of "publications designed to influence public opinion."

While it expressly exempts religious, fraternal, temperance and scientific publications, it would at the same time deny the use of the mails to newspapers, magazines, trade journals and all publications of kind which fail to file semi-annual, sworn statements giving the names and addresses of editors, owners and principal stockholders. A copy of such sworn statements is required to be published in such papers after filing.

The bill further requires that all paid editorials and other reading matter for which money was paid "shall be plainly marked 'Advertisement.'"

It is not anticipated that the bill will be opposed to any extent.

FRANK B. SHUTTS, Publisher

Who Is Frank Simonds?

This Is Meant To Be a Superlative—Yet a Conservative Announcement Exclusively for the Owners of Newspapers and Managing Editors

FRANK SIMONDS entered Harvard in 1896 and was graduated in 1900. At that time Harvard was the only university that permitted elective selection of studies after the first year. A glance at all of the studies for the last three years of his course shows that he specialized in ancient, medieval and modern history and international law and that later he did research work in these studies.

Next we find Mr. Simonds as chief editorial writer on foreign subjects in THE EVENING SUN, and the only editorial writer in the United States who predicted months and months in advance a world war. He did this in THE EVENING SUN in a column and a half editorial, which was ridiculed by many of the great newspapers in this country.

We next see Mr. Simonds as Associate Editor of THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE. Then for four years war correspondent and chief editorial writer on international subjects for that paper, his articles being syndicated to more than 100 papers.

At this time, or, to be exact, eleven years ago, Dr. Albert Shaw, editor-in-chief of Review of Reviews, engaged Frank Simonds to write ITS LEADING ARTICLE on INTERNATIONAL SUBJECTS every month.

This he has continued to do without interruption for ELEVEN YEARS. So great has been the success of his articles that from time to time Dr. Shaw has written in the Review of Reviews editorials commending Frank Simonds and his extraordinary acquaintance with foreign affairs, his vision and his foresight.

Repeatedly he has been quoted in the Senate and the House and in important debates you will find the Congressional Record carrying the quoted writings in the newspapers of Frank Simonds.

For the past eight years Frank Simonds has been syndicated by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate in one, two or three articles a week.

At the time—1918—that Mr. Simonds left the New York Tribune — in the three weeks that intervened till he came to the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, Mr. Simonds was offered by Mr. Frank A. Munsey the position as Editor of the New York Evening Sun and by Mr. Van Anda, the position as Managing Editor and Foreign Correspondent of the New York Times.

Mr. Simonds came to the McClure Syndicate for the very good reason that the Syndicate offered him more money than either Mr. Ochs or Mr. Munsey and in no time during the eight years past have we regretted so doing.

Mr. Simonds has attended every Peace Conference in the last fourteen years.

Mr. Simonds has known and interviewed Painlevé, Briand, Poincaré, Clemenceau, Viviani, Earl Grey, Asquith, Lloyd George, Stresemann, Luther, Ramsay MacDonald, Ambassadors Houghton and Kellogg and many others.

Frank Simonds is known more intimately by Cabinet Officers, Ambassadors, Ministers and diplomatic attachés in the last twelve years than any man living that we know of.

A few years ago Mr. Simonds purchased the old Spanish Embassy in Washington where he resides, and keeps open house particularly for those interested in Foreign Affairs.

If there are some who are curious to know in what high regard Frank Simonds is held by people who have a right and authority to speak and write upon things of a foreign nature, we should like to call attention to three books published in the last few years and published by the following high class publishing houses—Harper & Brothers, Appleton and Doran—the authors of which are Philip Gibbs, Colonel Reppington and Stephen Lauzanne. In each of these books Frank Simonds is the only American writer on international affairs who is mentioned. In each of these books each author pays him exclusive compliments and Philip Gibbs refers to him as the Dean of all American Correspondents.

FRANK SIMONDS IS NOT A REPORTER. He does not quote the big statesmen that he interviews—and if he did quote them HE WOULD NOT BE INTERVIEWING THEM and GETTING REAL FACTS year after year, ADVANCE INFORMATION, and the most important news, we believe, of any writer on foreign affairs living today.

Mr. Simonds sails on the sixteenth direct for the Conference at Geneva. His articles will appear once, twice or three times a week, as the importance of the news, in our judgment, justifies. They will come by cable, radio and mail.

Here is a series of articles which lend dignity, character and standing to any newspaper.

After attending the Conference, Frank Simonds will visit, study and analyze conditions in Rome, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Prague, Budapest and probably London and Warsaw. He will write, not alone on the Great Powers, but on the Border States and the Russian subjects as viewed from adjoining countries.

To sum up, then, our honest opinion is—that FRANK SIMONDS KNOWS MORE of INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, SITUATIONS and CONDITIONS than any college professor in the United States, Great Britain or on the Continent. Further, it is our honest belief that Frank Simonds knows more than any United States Senator, present Cabinet Officer or Ex-Cabinet Officer about foreign relations. There may be some people who do not think so, but this is our honest belief after close association with Mr. Simonds for a great many years.

The following papers look upon Mr. Simonds as their own representative of international affairs of the utmost importance. They have all gladly agreed to pay from five to twenty-five dollars a week more to have Mr. Simonds make this trip at this particular time.

AGENCY PRACTICES ON SHORT RATES AND REBATES CRITICIZED

Most Agencies Quick to Claim Rebates But Negligent in Settling When Newspaper Makes Claim, Ad Manager Declares

By A. D. MANAGER

THE advertising agency, as a cog in the great machine of production and distribution, needs no defense. Besides being quite able to fight its own battles, its undoubted services to both the advertiser and the publisher demonstrate its usefulness—if not its indispensability.

As a business institution, however, the advertising agency is not without its faults. Especially in its relations with the small newspaper publishers is it open to criticism. Honest criticism can do it no harm. Indeed, it is time that some of the just complaints of the publishers were aired.

Some weeks ago in these columns protest was made against the remarkable facility with which the checking departments of many of the agencies succeed in mislaying the checking copies sent to them. That habit is exasperating enough, but it is less costly to the publishers than is another habit which some of the agencies have contracted—that of invariably disputing short-rate bills and, not infrequently, refusing to pay them.

The position taken by too many agencies seems to be that it is far more blessed to receive then to give. When they earn a rebate, they are almost indecently quick to claim it; but when one fails to earn a rate granted in consideration of a contract to use a given amount of space, it is a horse of another color.

One example will suffice to show the common tendency:

One of the largest and best known agencies made a contract in 1923 for 14,000 lines and used only 8,036 lines. The next year it made another contract, on the same account, also for 14,000 lines. Only 3,920 were used. In 1924 the agency made still another contract, on the same account, that time for 10,000 lines. For the third time the contract was not fulfilled, only 1,680 lines being used.

At the agency's request, the expiration date of the last contract was changed from April 24 to May 14, in order to permit using more space. As a result, 378 more lines were used during the added period, bringing the total to 2,058 lines.

The short-rate adjustment had been brought to the agency's attention at the time the contract actually expired, a bill for 1,680 lines having been sent. Its payment was protested by the agency, which, in a letter dated a few days before th date to which the contract had been extended, told the publisher's New York representative that it was felt that the paper should waive the payment of the short-rate because the time was "so far beyond expiration of last year's contract" that it had made all its settlements with its client and did not want 'to be put in the embarrassing position of opening up the matter for one case."

Another absolutely indefensible practice in some agencies is that of attempting to place advertising at a rate applicable only on a greater linage than there is any intention of using. One agency—and one that is supposed to be all that an agency should be—frankly admitted that the space is desired to contract for would not be used. Moreover, it brazenly announced that it positively would not pay short-rates.

Naturally, there was no difficulty in meeting that situation. The advertising manager had only to refuse the business on which he had been warned he would be defrauded.

But the matter is not always so easily handled. The majority of the agencies resorting to that sort of sharp practice keep their intentions to themselves until the contract period has ended and they have been billed for short-rates. And in those cases the publishers of small newspapers are pretty nearly helpless.

Another annoyance to which the publisher is often subjected is the making of contracts in apparent good faith and then failing to use any of the space contracted for. Of course, there are circumstances under which a thing of that kind is justified, but it is often done without discoverable reason.

What can a publisher do in such case? Obviously, he can not short-rate the agency, for there has been no advertising for which to charge. Nor is there any precedent for claiming compensation in any other way for the time and trouble of keeping the necessary records.

Of course, one of the remedies for the publisher's troubles lies in the establishment of a flat rate, but that is not always practicable. The only alternative is the transaction of business on the basis of fair play. Perhaps it is too much to expect the Golden Rule to govern the relations between publishers and agencies, but a nearer approach to it as a guiding principle would most certainly inure to the benefit of both.

CLOSE CONTACT WITH LOCAL DAILIES AIDS LOUISIANA JOURNALISM SCHOOL

Baton Rouge State Times and Morning Advocate Used As Laboratory for Reporters' Class—Once a Year Entire Paper Taken Over and Students' Edition Issued

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

(This is Fourth of a Series of Articles Interpreting the Work of Journalism Schools to Editors of the Nation.)

CLOSE affiliation with two local newspapers, the Baton Rouge (La.) State Times and the Morning Advocate, published by Charles P. Manship, aids M. G. Osborn, director of the department of journalism, very materially in his efforts to instruct some 150 boys and girls in the intricacies of newspaper work.

M. G. Osborn

Two years ago, these dailies moved into a new modern plant, and the plans included a special workshop, 17 by 18 feet, adjacent to the city room to be used by the department as a journalism laboratory. Ida Blanche Ogden, the city editor and former student of the school, now an instructor, teaches the school's sophomore class in reporting each year. This class of about 30 members reports to Miss Ogden daily and covers the entire city for her without pay as part of their school work.

Miss Ogden does not spare these cub reporters. All sorts of assignments as they arise are handed out to them, and, when stories are brought in, she tears them to pieces and has them entirely rewritten, when necessary.

In April of each year the executive staffs of the two papers are given a one-day extra holiday. Even Mr. Manship leaves the publisher's office for a fishing trip. And the newspaper is published entirely by the journalism class.

Mr. Ogden does not send Freshmen to the newspaper plant for regular work. He begins each year, however, by introducing new students to a newspaper office. In a lecture they are first informed of the A.B.C.'s of newspaper organization, and then taken through the State Times and Advocate building and shown at first hand what the talking is all about.

Then later they are assigned to write stories, to fathom by practice the development of a news yarn from lead to conclusion. These stories are never published. Usually they are based upon imagined facts.

"I find myself constantly suggesting points the young writers leave out of these stories," Mr. Osborn said. "'Tell all the interesting facts and then stop,' I tell my classes. 'Remember the reader. Imagine questions other people would ask if they had the reporter's opportunities.'"

Other inspection tours are designed to give the yearlings knowledge of newspaper manufacturing operations. They are shown the sextuple presses in operation; watch the make-up men at work; observe the processes of stereotyping, and are put to work on occasion at proof-reading. Once a year the entire school travels to New Orleans to visit the plants of the dailies of that city.

"But I am fast being converted to the idea that the technical side of the newspaper business is not the side to be stressed by journalism schools," Mr. Osborn declared. "Students must be given cultural background. Of most importance to future news writers, I believe, is a thorough knowledge of what have come to be called the background subjects, such as economics, philosophy, literature, and the arts.

"I also believe in devoting considerable class-room time to discussion of current events. It is compulsory for students to keep up with the changing news. They must read such dailies as the New York Times, New York World, New York Herald Tribune, New York Evening Post, Boston Transcript, Memphis Commercial Appeal, Portland Oregonian, and the Kansas City Star."

The Louisiana journalism department has been in operation since 1912. Growth was slow at first. In 1921 there were not more than 45 students enrolled. Since that time the number has more than tripled.

"With 148 in our classes now, we cannot meet the demand of Louisiana papers for newspaper men and women," Mr. Osborn said. "After graduation, the majority of our students go into the Louisiana field, where, from a start of $25 a week, they can work to a top of $70."

From managing editor down, the Baton Rouge State Times is exclusively in charge of former University students. In addition to Miss Ogden, other school graduates now working for the Baton Rouge daily include Jack Adams, managing editor; Robert B. Todd, sports editor; Herbert Benjamin, advertising manager; Edward O. Goldsby, assistant advertising manager; and Mrs. Frank Womack, society editor.

Mr. Osborn himself was for five years associated with the State Times as telegraph editor and editorial writer. He has been director of the journalism department since January, 1921. He has had graduate work in journalism at Ohio State University.

Mr. Osborn is the present president of the American Association of Teachers of Journalism.

Aged Portland Newsie Dead

Perhaps the most unusual news vendor in the United States, Francis Gurks, 94, died a few days ago in Portland, Ore. Gurks was usually referred to as St. Francis, or St. Francis of the Gunny Sacks, because his feet were always clad in burlap. Although apparently a pauper, Gurks left an estate "not in excess of $50,000," according to the filing made with the will. Ten thousand dollars of it has been found in gilt edge securities and it is believed that the amount will be largely increased. All of it is left to the "United States Board of Education," by which, it is supposed the bureau of education was intended.

SHRYOCK NAMED B. M. OF CHICAGO NEWS

Publishers Former Assistant Takes Executive Post—Leslie Barton Appointed Advertising Manager

James N. Shryock assistant business manager of the Chicago Daily News has been appointed business manager to succeed Walter A. Strong, now publisher and principal owner of that paper.

JAMES N. SHRYOCK

Coincident with the promotion of Mr. Shryock, the appointment of Leslie M. Barton, advertising man of wide experience as new advertising manager of the Daily News was announced by Mr. Strong.

Mr. Shryock joined the News nine years ago as a classified advertising solicitor at $10 a week. He progressed steadily, successively holding the positions of circulation promotion manager, assistant advertising manager, and assistant business manager.

L. M. BARTON

Mr. Barton succeeds J. B. Woodward, who is to be foreign representative of the News with offices in New York and Chicago. Mr. Barton is 36 years of age. He started on his advertising career at 16 as an office boy with the William S. Power Company of Pittsburgh. Two years later he became an advertising solicitor for the Pittsburgh-Gazette Times. He held various positions elsewhere in the next two decades and until coming to Chicago a month ago, had been vice president of McKinny, Marsh & Cushing, of Detroit, the concern which handles the Ford Motor company accounts.

For some time he has been associated with his employer, Walter A. Strong, in the "100,000 Group of American Cities," of which Mr. Strong is president and Mr. Barton secretary and treasurer.

Mr. Barton has made a special study of merchandising with reference to newspaper advertising. He compiled the volume, "A Study of 81 Principal American Markets," for the 100,000 Group. Within the last twelve month, $125,000 was spent in distributing this book.

The Chicago and Detroit offices of Woodward & Kelly will continue to handle the Daily News advertising accounts as before, and on the Pacific coast C. George Krogness will have charge of the News' interests.

HUNTING IN CAROLINAS

First Incident in W. H. Dodge's Retirement Is Pleasure Trip

William H. Dodge, retiring president of Allied Newspapers, Inc., plans to leave New York about Feb. 1 for an extended hunting trip in the Carolinas.

Mr. Dodge started his business career, at 14 years, with a capital of $1.75, as stock boy in a clothing establishment, working Sundays as a bottle-washer.

Making the acquaintance of F. W. Kellogg, then advertising manager of Cleveland Press, he entered the employ of that newspaper at $3.00 a week. In a short time he became classified advertising manager, ascending rapidly to the position of advertising manager, business manager of Cincinnati Post, assistant to the president of the Scripps-McRae group, president of eight Scripps-McRae newspaper companies.

He was one of the chief associates of Mr. Scripps in organizing and building up these journalistic enterprises. When they became Scripps-Howard newspapers, Mr. Dodge was elected president of the Central Group of newspapers.

At that time the national representation of the Scripps-Howard list was handled by a national advertising department. Mr. Dodge held the idea of a new Scripps-Howard company, with a chain of important offices over the country, with powerful selling staffs, devoted to vigorous representation of the 24 newspapers. In 1922 he organized Allied Newspapers, Inc., and formed a staff of able advertising men.

At intervals during the past five years he has found time to organize and direct the business end of Washington Daily News, Baltimore Post and a number of other new Scripps-Howard enterprises in which he became director and stockholder. He retains his extensive stock interests.

"The greatest satisfaction I have found in the newspaper business", said Mr. Dodge, "is the men whom I have helped to find themselves. There has been infinite pleasure in watching a score or more young men climb their way to posts of importance, responsibility and partnerships. These sentimental and human rewards count most."

PAPER GROUP TO MEET

Canadian Association to Discuss Pulpwood Resources, Jan. 27-29

The extent of Canada's pulpwood resources will be discussed by Federal officials and chief foresters of three provinces at the annual convention of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, which will be held in Montreal, Jan. 27, 28 and 29. The question of export tax on pulpwood is not on the agenda, but may again come up for lively discussion. F. W. Clarke, president of the Association, will preside, and a large representation of men interested in the industry is looked for.

Among the special speakers will be Col. R. R. McCormick, president of the Ontario Paper Company and co-publisher of the Chicago Tribune, and Professor Herbert Hibbart, well-known authority on cellulose chemistry, who was recently appointed to the chair of Industrial and Cellulose Chemistry at McGill University. There will be papers on technical problems connected with all phases of the industry given by experts from various parts of the United States and Canada.

A resolution passed at last year's meeting of the Association precipitated a nation-wide discussion of the embargo question.

Thomas and Horace C. Stilwell New Owners of Florida Daily —Plan Morning Paper

Sale of the Ft. Lauderdale (Fla.) Evening and Sunday News by L. S. and W. J. Galvin, publishers, to Thomas and Horace C. Stilwell took place Jan. 9. The price was not disclosed.

The Stilwells plan to issue a morning paper named the Sun for which Associated Press service has been obtained. The News has A. P. service. The two papers will be issued from the same plant. Executives for the new paper have not yet been named.

The new owners came to Florida from Indiana where they were in business.

The News represents a consolidation of the old Ft. Lauderdale Sentinel and Weekly Herald which were were purchased by the Galvins in February 1925, from Col. George G. Mathews. The Galvin brothers came to Florida from Ohio where they publish the Lima Daily and Sunday News and the Wilmington Daily News-Journal.

Upon purchasing the Ft. Lauderdale papers they built a two-story plant and installed a new press and other equipment.

The sellers and purchasers were brought together by Olin W. Kennedy, managing editor of the Miami Herald.

The Galvins stated they were not ready to announce their plans for the future in Florida.

COUSINS LOSE APPEAL

Technicality Thwarts Further Attempt to Break Eastman Will

Seven cousins of the late John C. Eastman, former publisher of the Chicago Daily Journal, have been denied an appeal from a probate court ruling which upheld the will of the publisher as drawn. They had attempted to break the instrument which bequeathed the Journal to three employees of Mr. Eastman, W. Frank Dunn, O. L. Hall, and H. G. Deuter.

Judge Kickham Scanlan of the Cook County Circuit Court upheld the technical contentions of the newspaper attorneys, that the contestants failed to pay the necessary fee to the clerk of the probate court in the statutory time required to carry the probate court decision to the circuit court. They missed it by two days, according to the evidence.

"I have wrestled with this motion," said the judge, "With a disposition to beat the motion; but I don't make the law. I am so satisfied that if I overrule this motion I would be reversed in the upper court, that I am compelled to follow the law. I am unable to find any way to get around it, and the motion to overrule will have to be granted."

The contestants gave notice of intention to appeal to the state supreme court.

Pulp Group Plans Laboratory

The Canadian Pulp and Paper Association has on foot a project to erect on the campus of McGill University, Montreal, a building which will provide suitable accommodation and equipment for research laboratories of the association and of the Department of Industrial Chemistry at McGill. Towards the maintenance of this latter department the association has subscribed $7,500 a year.

"What is the Ludlow?"
Here is the answer

THE Ludlow is a system of producing, in sluglines, type of any point-size from 6 to 60 point, including bold and extended. The matrices are set from a case by hand, into a special stick and then the line is cast on the Ludlow.

Every slug is delivered trimmed to exact typeheight ready to print. The casting is entirely automatic.

The Ludlow is simple, fool-proof, reliable. There are no intricate adjustments—any compositor can operate it after an hour's instruction.

The quality of Ludlow faces—the amazing speed at which the copy is set—the economy and efficiency of this machine all recommend it to newspapers satisfied with nothing but the best.

Gentlemen:

I feel we would be unappreciative if we did not take this occasion to let you know how gratified we are with the increased speed and efficiency which we have had in our stereo room since the recent installation of your Pony Autoplate.

Both our mechanical superintendent, Mr. H. M. Butler, and the stereo foreman, Mr. Hulme, are unanimous as to its efficiency and of course the latter is particularly pleased with the fact that the Pony Autoplate is a labor saver, in that it has done away with the lifting of plate out of the box, and to our mind this is where considerable of the increased speed is accounted for. Our mechanical superintendent also informs us that in the rush hours we never think of even giving the plate an extra hand trimming but plate it on the press just as it comes from the Pony Autoplate.

We are glad to advise you that at no time have we regretted our decision in ordering your machine and we want you to know how pleased we are not only with the Autoplate itself, but with the many courtesies you have extended us since its installation.

CAUSE AND EFFECT

THE Senate committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Couzens, has reported a condition in the Treasury Department that must have been dumbfounding to the average citizen who has paid his income tax honestly and as a sincere public duty. Improper amortizations cost the government $210,000,000, while tax refunds in some four years totaled nearly $460,000,000, according to the report.

It is officially charged that, behind the curtains of our government, there has been "bargaining" and "favoritism" and there is a damning indictment against the personnel of Uncle Sam's treasure house.

All very unpleasant reading for the American public, but not surprising to any thinking newspaper man. The Committee itself tells in clear language how the alleged skulduggery has been possible. Here you are, in the words of the report:

"The unsatisfactory conditions developed by this investigation are the inevitable result of the delegation of almost unlimited discretion to be secretly exercised. It is believed that but few of the unsound settlements to which attention has been called would have been made if it were not for the belief that they would never become public."

Public business done in secret, with money or any other valuable perquisite at stake, just will not work. Men are selfish, men are greedy, men are able to twist conscience into convenient sophistry, to gain privilege over their fellows. It is a story as old as the hills that a type of man considers it no crime to cheat the government that protects him and fosters his welfare, if and when he believes that he will not be found out. Publicity is the great guard that stands at the gates of our republic. As newspaper men we have seen the fact demonstrated over and over thousands of times. The framers of the Constitution recognized the danger and licensed the press to stand at the gates to guard.

The Couzens report is made public at a time when, seemingly by unanimous consent of a large section of the press and of the representatives of the people at Washington, the publicity feature of the income tax law, as it affects individual returns, is about to be killed. Indeed, EDITOR & PUBLISHER finds itself crying like a voice in the wilderness for publicity of tax returns. Most of the newspaper men we hear from actually believe that the great duty of standing guard over the collection of public funds should be abandoned, on the ground that it is an "invasion of private rights." Of all the things in the world that journalists might be sensitive about in their work of publishing personal news, the amount of money that a man has paid as income tax seems to have been selected as the great taboo.

We think it may be fairly said that the Couzens report of conditions which have sprung from secrecy in one department of the tax collection bureau indicates what may be expected if secrecy is made the standard for the whole system.

Sow free publicity and reap the contempt of all advertisers.

FORD PUBLICITY AGAIN

J. J. CALLAN, of the advertising department of Ford Motor Company, Milwaukee, Wis., on January 4 sent to editors a letter, with a "story" enclosed. The story was a detailed advertisement concerning special equipment that had been added to the Ford car. In his letter Mr. Callan advised editors that a "story" he had previously sent out on the same subject had "not been printed exactly as originally edited" and asked publication of the substitute story. He asked for free copies of the paper containing the revision. It is not clear whether Mr. Callan's department was thus putting over a correction, or whether the big idea was to get the free publicity printed exactly as "originally edited." At any rate, the "story" was calculated to sell Ford cars to the readers of newspapers, with only the small expense of a press agent and postage. Mr. Ford did not build his giant structure by free distribution of his assets, and it is a mistake for newspaper publishers to freely distribute their only marketable commodities.

He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love.—1. John, III; 8.

COAL STRIKE NEWS

IT is saying something that everyone knows—that the hot-spot of controversy in American life more feared by publicists than any other question, is the ceaseless battle between organized labor and organized capital. For ten years newspapers, by and large, have increasingly neglected both news presentation and editorial leadership in labor affairs, first on the pretext of maintaining strict neutrality, latterly on the pretext that neither capital nor labor can be trusted to tell the truth, with the added commonly accepted notion that the general public is not interested.

A few years ago we noted the neglect by the press of the gigantic strike of iron workers, centering at Pittsburgh. Some damning charges have since been made against newspapers and newspaper men on account of the handling of that conflict, the chief allegation being that, in effect, a section of the press entered into a conspiracy with capital to suppress the vital news of the fight. None of our readers familiar with the facts will dispute the statement that the story was handled with gloves and, by the rank and file of editors, was regarded as "loaded."

On Sept. 1, 1925, the anthracite coal miners opened the biggest strike campaign in the history of this country, in point of number of men involved, and the battle has run into one of the most stupendous losses in labor history. In the coal region it has been a quiet struggle, as there has been no organized effort to break it by force. The strike has disturbed social and economic conditions, however, as gravely as any labor conflict during this generation.

From September to date the newspapers have handled the subject listlessly, casually, only the exceptional newspaper showing any spirited disposition seriously and candidly to penetrate the issues. Days and weeks have passed with little or only routine mention of the strife. Indeed, it is our opinion, that this great strike has been the most underplayed big story of modern times. This opinion is largely based upon a contrast between the handling of this story and that of the strike of these same men, practically for the same causes, a quarter of a century ago.

The issues between the miners John Mitchell led in 1901-2 and the operators of those days were impressed upon the minds of every intelligent citizen through featured newspaper publicity. So great did the public clamor become for an honest settlement of the conflict that President Theodore Roosevelt, with no more law than now obtains, forced an arbitration agreement as one of the first important acts of his administration.

In candor we now ask: How many newspaper readers today know that the demands of the strikers led by Lewis were for $1 a day increase for all day workers, an increase of 10 per cent for contract miners, the check-off of union dues and assessments, and added minor conditions? Ask a reporter on your staff what the check-off issue really means. Will he know? Would he be able to tell you what the attitude of the operators and Lewis has been toward arbitration?

The point is, are people, through newspaper information, intelligently discussing these matters or are they saying the coal operators are a lot of highwaymen; the miners get $90 a week and live like princes; soft coal in a grate constructed for anthracite burns as well; it is all a conspiracy and the labor leaders are as bad a bunch of grafters as the mine owners, and other such assertions having no base of actual knowledge? It is our experience that such is the common talk. The average reader knows more definitely the cut of Irving Berlin's collar, or the color of Mrs. Rhinelander's eyes, or the 1924 batting average of any popular ball player, than the main essentials of a labor dispute which has brought misery to thousands of people of the coal regions, huge losses to capital, suffering, inconvenience and waste to millions of coal consumers and has put clouds of soot into the air of many heretofore clean cities.

Cynical newspaper men are heard insisting that the public is not interested and will not read a serious strike story. We think that is the veriest nonsense, and we judge so because every man and woman we meet in New York wants to talk about the coal strike and seems utterly lost in trying to explain it. Of course, the public will not breathlessly follow a dry account of any event or hand-outs and unsupported assertions put up as "news."

The vast majority of newspapers are free of industrial or banker control. We know of no coal advertising influence. Yet the general press has dodged the coal strike, publishing as little as possible of the inescapable spot news developments, avoiding four-square editorial page discussion, and almost completely neglecting feature display of the human factors involved.

A great story has, for a third of a year, been handled as a routine matter.

Because it does business in the open, the press is a shining mark for critics.

ADD "PEARLS"

A STIRRING appeal to the youth of journalism schools to don the mantle of mediocrity and play bird dog for materialism was made last week by Marco Morrow, assistant publisher of the Capper Farm Press. Mr. Morrow spoke to the boys at the Kansas State Agricultural College, setting up the doctrine that the newspaper is a commercial enterprise, serving commercially minded people in a commercial age. He urged that uplift be avoided and his deepest fear seemed to be that someone would commit hypocrisy.

Mr. Morrow, if correctly quoted, made the following astonishing assertion: "The men who really help mankind move forward are the men who keep step with their fellows, elbow to elbow, and gently, almost imperceptibly, give the former urge."

On the contrary, journalism, both professional and commercial, is calling for leadership today, as never before. No leader walks elbow to elbow and gently urges—he steps out and courageously finds the path for the sightless, aimless, stumbling herd. Mr. Morrow's philosophy is shallow and futile and, by following it, no boy can catch inspiration which will raise him six inches above the dust. It is difficult to believe that an apostle of Capper of Kansas would seriously plead the cause of a low ideal, and we wonder if Marco Morrow is not spoofing.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

ARTHUR S. THOMPSON, who recently left the Associated Press after long service to assume the management of the news ink department of the H. D. Roosen Company, New York, brings to his new field a wide acquaintance with newspaper publishers and a varied range of activities bearing on the newspaper field.

A. S. THOMPSON

He became secretary to the general manager of the Associated Press, then Melville E. Stone, in 1913, and continued in that capacity when Frederick Roy Martin succeeded Mr. Stone in 1920. Mr. Thompson handled arrangements for all of the annual meetings and luncheons of the A. P. and in recent months as executive assistant under General Manager Kent Cooper, he visited the offices of many members detailing the progressive policies of the service.

The advertising campaign that the Associated Press began a few months ago—a distinct innovation for the A. P. and striking some seldom-heard notes in advertising—was designed and carried out by Mr. Thompson. It has been cordially received by the members.

Mr. Thompson, prior to joining the A. P. service, had spent eight years in the Philippine Islands, during most of which he was associated with the War Department's efforts to establish a shipping industry in the islands. He returned to the United States in 1912 as secretary to John Skelton Williams, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

NEW PLANTS AND EQUIPMENT

SALAMANCA (N. Y.) REPUBLICAN PRESS, is having plans drawn for a new home to be built adjoining the present three story plant. New equipment will be purchased.

Ottawa (Kan.) Herald has purchased a new Duplex tubular press to be installed before March 1. R. A. Harris is publisher.

Danville (Ill.) Commercial-News, which is now pushing to completion an annex which will provide an increase of 50 per cent in the plant's floor space, has purchased ground to the rear of its present building in anticipation of further development. The new site is 44 by 147 feet, giving a 12-foot driveway through a private alley, but excavation underneath this alleyway will give the Commercial-News an unbroken basement space of 180 feet and the second floor may be bridged across.

Hagerstown (Md.) Herald-Mail has awarded the contract for the erection of a large addition to its newspaper building on South Jonathan street. The addition will house a new press.

Recent Intertype installations have been made on the following newspapers: Indianapolis Star; Brookville (Ind.) Democrat; Edgar (Neb.) Sun; Rochelle (Ill.) Register; Amboy (Ill.) News; Lincoln (Neb.) Star; St. Louis Globe-Democrat (8).

New press equipment has been shipped to the Tokio Nichi Nichi by R. Hoe & Co. It will increase the press facilities of that newspaper to three octuples.

DAILY'S PRESIDENT, 72, SETS TYPE BY HAND DURING PUEBLO STRIKE

WHEN printers on Pueblo, Col., newspapers struck, Wednesday evening of last week, G. G. Withers, 72-year old president of the Pueblo Chieftain, morning newspaper, went back to the type case with a printer's stick in his hand to assist in getting out the paper.

As reported last week in EDITOR & PUBLISHER, the strike lasted but a day, ending in an immediate increase of $1.50 to the printers and a second $1.50 increase July 1, next.

With the back room dark and both advertising and news advertising copy piling up, Mr. Withers organized a force of circulation and advertising men to man the composing room. He was determined that the Chieftain's record of 58 years' publication without missing an issue should not be broken.

Manager George H. Sweeney investigated the intricacies of the linotypes. Under inexpert guidance the machines soon stuck, only half a column of type being set. Outside of this quota, all the new composition in the paper was hand set. But the paper went down on time for both editions.

Members of Pueblo Typographical Union No. 175 asked for a $4 a week increase in the Pueblo wage scale on Jan. 1, 1925. The matter had been pending since that time. A hearing on the matter was held before the Colorado Industrial Commission in October, 1925, and the commission's award was for a $3 per week raise in the Pueblo wage scale. The scale had previously stood at $44 a week.

This award was accepted by the printers but was not satisfactory to the publishers of the Chieftain and the Star-Journal. Managers of the two papers wrote the union a joint letter, notifying the men that the award of the commission was rejected by the publishers.

There was talk of a strike for Jan. 1, but it did not develop for that date. Just four minutes before time for the night shift to go to work on the evening of Jan. 6, the Chieftain manager, Mr. Sweeney, who has recently taken over the management of the paper, was notified by his shop foreman that a strike had been called and that none of the printers would report for the night shift.

Former N. Y. Men Meet in Florida

W. Bob Holland, now an editorial writer on the Miami (Fla.) Herald, recently made an automobile tour of Florida during his vacation with Mrs. Holland. While at Lakeland Mr. Holland spent several hours with Morton Watkins, for many years the New York correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, who went to Florida six years ago and bought a citrus grove. Mr. Watkins, for a time totally blind from an eye disease, has partially recovered his sight.

ADVERTISING AGENCY AFFAIRS

Milton Towne Elected Joseph Richards Company President—Jenkins Leaves MacManus, Inc., to Join George Harrison Phelps, —Clark Vice-President of World Wide

MILTON TOWNE has been elected president of Joseph Richards Company, Inc., 247 Park avenue, New York, succeeding Joseph A. Richards who has been made chairman of the board. Mr. Towne joined the Richards Company in 1909 and has been vice president and treasurer for a number of years.

Warner H. Jenkins, Jr., formerly vice-president of MacManus, Inc., has resigned that position to become an officer and general executive of George Harrison Phelps, Inc., advertising agency 110 Rowena street, Detroit. For the past 20 years Mr. Jenkins has been associated with the advertising business having been originally with the Howard E. Ireland advertising agency at Philadelphia. After leaving the Ireland Company he was with Power, Alexander & Jenkins, Detroit for eight years. The Phelps Company, with which Jenkins is now connected, is engaged in newspaper and magazine advertising, billboards, and the newer form of radio advertising.

An Increase of Six Million Lines
Over 1924 In the Past Year

Our Record

14,652,904 lines of advertising with an average of more than a million and a half lines each month for the last three months is the record of 1925 as set by The TIMES. This is an increase of 6,426,896 lines over the record of the previous year. These figures prove that advertisers recognize the resultfulness of telling their messages to the large and concentrated circulation of the great daily.

Our Territory

The TIMES thoroughly covers the city of Tampa—the largest in Florida, besides adequately serving the highly prosperous and progressive Tampa Territory, which is dotted with splendid and florishing little cities and towns. The supper hour in thousands of homes in this prosperous region finds this metropolitan newspaper on hand with your message.

ST. LOUIS PRINTERS GET WAGE INCREASE

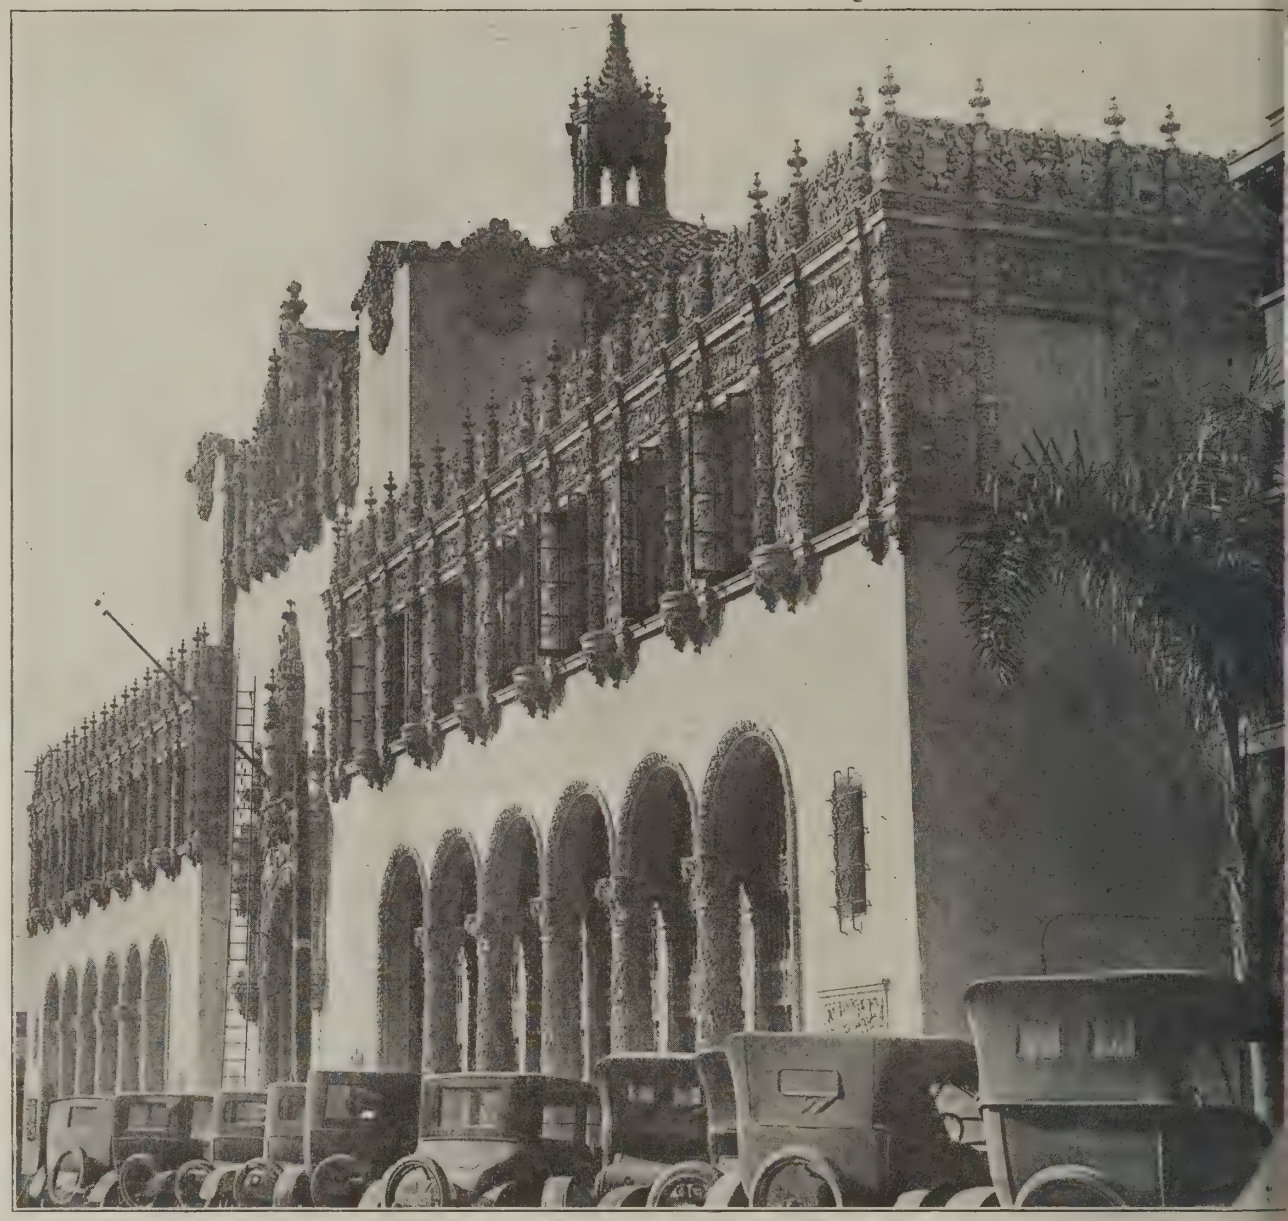
Arbitrator Grants $2 Advance on Time Work, 4% on Piece Work and to Apprentices Retroactive to June 1, 1925

Printers employed on St. Louis newspapers have received an increase of $2 a week on all time work, 4 per cent. increase on all piece work, and 4 per cent. increase to apprentices, retroactive to June 1, last. About $25,000 was paid out under the retroactive clause of the agreement, which was reached through arbitration.

Under the terms of the award of the arbitrator, former Mayor Henry W. Kiel, it was provided that "in the event that this scale shall remain in effect until June 1, 1927, it shall be made retroactive to June 1, 1925. If, however, the wage question is to be taken up as of June 1, 1926, it shall be effective as of December 1, 1925."

Both the publishers and the union accepted the first provision of the award, and thus the scale adopted remains in effect until June 1, 1927, and the printers received the back pay, which averaged about $50 to each worker. The publishers were the first to move the acceptance of this agreement.

The reopening of the agreement started in April last year, with Homer Bassford of the Times and A. G. Lincoln of the Post-Dispatch representing the St. Louis Publishers' Association and W. J. Gibbons and M. Campbell, the standing Newspaper Scale Committee of Typographical Union No. 8, the printers. The publishers asked for a 10 per cent, reduction in the scale; the union asked for a 22 per cent. increase.



In the negotiations, the publishers were assisted by J. B. Pinkham, secretary of the New York State Publishers' Association, while the printers called in Raymond Moore of the Arbitration Bureau of the International Typographical Union. Mr. Bassford acted for the publishers and Mr. Gibbons for the union, in the arbitration proceedings. Former Mayor Kiel, the outsider, is a general contractor.

Mr. Kiel declined to accept anything for his services, taking the money that such a gift would have cost and buying a radio set for the women patients of Koch Tubercular Hospital.

Under the new agreement, the scale is $51 for 46-hour week for day work and $56 for 45-hour week, night work.

The members of the St. Louis Publishers Association are the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, St. Louis Star and St. Louis Times. The award also was accepted by the Westliche Post, St. Louis Daily Record, a court paper, and the World Color Printing Company.

MAKING INK WORK

Chicago Group Co-operating in Broadcasting City's Slogan

A plan to "get all the ink working for Chicago" is being evolved by Chicago advertising experts, under the inspiration of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

"Chicago, the Great Central Market," is the idea local advertisers are seeking to develop throughout the nation. To do this a committee headed by W. Frank McClure, vice-president of Albert Frank & Co., is seeking new opportunities to get the slogan, "Chicago the Great Central Market" wherever it can be placed.

Marshall Field & Co. have placed the line on the gummed paper tape used to seal all packages sent from the store. Billboard concerns are to be importuned to find a corner on every billboard for the slogan. A series of newspaper advertisements is planned to blazon the advantages of Chicago. Mercantile and financial houses will be asked to co-operate.

Mr. McClure's assistants include G. R. Schaffer, advertising manager of Marshall Field & Co.; J. R. Ozanne, advertising manager wholesale house of Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co.; H. E. Erickson, General Outdoor Advertising Company; Ernest I. Mitchell, president, Mitchell-Faust Advertising Company.

Journalism Head Resigns

M. Lyle Spencer, dean of the school of journalism, University of Washington is resigning to give more time to textbook writing. Dean Spencer will continue as head of the department of journalism, until the end of the present academic year. His position is not expected to be filled, since the legislature has failed to provide sufficiently for the full requirements of the university.

Newspaper Denied Notary Powers

A newspaper is not qualified for appointment as notary public, according to a ruling by Judge D. A. Gregg, chief clerk of the Texas secretary of state. The Naples (Tex.) Monitor, a newspaper, had been appointed notary public.

Two 200-Ton Mills Planned

With the reorganization of the Whalen Pulp & Paper Mills and the Beaver Cove Lumber & Pulp Company in British Columbia, both of which intend to enter the newsprint manufacturing field with 200-ton mills, newsprint capacity in that province will be doubled. At present there are only two producers, the Powell River Pulp & Paper Company and the Pacific Mills at Ocean Falls, each turning out more than 200 tons a day. The Whalen Company is being reorganized as the British Columbia Pulp & Paper Company, while the International Harvester Company is behind the project.

Telephone company wants a 35 per cent increase in its rates. Probably due to the high cost of getting those wrong numbers.—New York American.

COUNTRY PUBLISHERS REPLY TO NEW

Legislative Committee of N. E. A. Present Arguments Against U. S. Envelope Printing in Letter to Griest

The Legislative Committee of the National Editorial Association on Jan. 7, replied to Postmaster General New's criticisms of country publishers contained in a letter to Hon. W. W. Griest, chairman of the House committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Excerpts from the reply, which was in the form of a letter to Mr. Griest and discussed the subjects of Government envelope printing and the free-in-country privilege, follow:

"Inasmuch as the Postmaster General in his letter addressed to you on Dec. 9, 1925, directs his criticism against the country publishers, we feel it is right and proper that the Congress should know the position of newspaper publishers on the stamped envelope question.

"The letter points out that individuals and organizations in rural districts benefit considerably by the low purchase price of stamped envelopes. It links with this statement mention of the free-in-county privilege accorded the country publisher, to indicate that he is also receiving a concession. The inference is that both the envelope user and publisher are favored, and the publisher should be contented. The truth of the matter is that when Congress extended the free-in-county privilege in 1851, they had the interest of the community in mind and not primarily the individual publisher.

"Insinuations have come from the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General from time to time that if the publishers continue their fight to restrict stamped envelopes, the free-in-county privilege would be withdrawn. Yet Mr. Joseph Stewart, executive assistant to the Postmaster General officially recommended its continuance in his testimony before our committee last spring, and he has consistently made this recommendation for a period of years. We do not understand why a subject so irrelevant should be drawn into the envelope controversy. The subject under consideration here is the Post Office Department's petition with publishers and printers. This should be decided on its own merits, without the introduction of extraneous matter.

"The Postmaster General passes lightly over the sales methods of departmental agents. He is strangely silent on the complaints made by publishers at various times on the activities of high pressure salesmen, backed by Government authority and placed on the Government payroll. Your attention is respectfully called to the testimony of New England publishers at the Boston hearings in August, 1925. At that time, it was shown that postal employes, under orders of postmasters, solicited large orders of envelopes, stressing the financial advantage of Government goods. We are firmly convinced this is stretching the public convenience theory too far.

"The Postmaster General's statement that 'printing by the Government costs cents against $1.00 or more which the average country printer would charge' clearly indicates what the Government will do when it competes with industry on a gigantic scale. It accentuates the fact we have repeatedly made that no commercial printer can compete with the Government under existing conditions. Further could any other business man compete if the Government should extend operations into other branches of private enterprise.

"The law prevents the Government from making any profit on this business. The Government's duty to its citizens does not seem to impel it to engage in no profit business which would destroy private business through its competition. It is a mystery why the Post Office Department should become so much exercised over a proposition like the Kendall Bill which, if adopted, would very much simplify its operations and to a large extent dispense with one of its activities which cannot produce net postal revenues but does call for what appears to be a large number of unnecessary employes, who are straining every effort to increase the profits of the Government stamped envelope contractor.

"It is our intention to reply further to the statements of the Postmaster General when your committee affords us the opportunity of presenting additional testimony at hearings on the Kendall Bill H. R. 4478.

"The correspondence addressed to members of Congress and the resolutions passed by the owners and editors of newspapers in each of the 48 states gives overwhelming evidence of the sentiment on this subject. The publishers are unanimous in their demand for legislative relief, and hope you will realize the justice of their cause.

PAPER FOR NEWSDEALERS

Bernarr MacFadden Launches 4-Page Tabloid for Distribution

Bernarr Macfadden this week started publication of New York Newsdealers' Weekly, a four-page tabloid, which plays up the news concerning the men, women and boys of the great metropolis through whoes hands millions of daily newspapers are passed on to the reading public.

Naturally, the paper is a New York Graphic promotion, but it is a sprightly paper for its clientele. Governor "Al" Smith gives the first issue a congratulatory message, in which he says: "Having had something to do with news-dealers in my boyhood days, I can testify from actual experience to the service they perform in distributing the great dailies and other publications so essential to the reading public. News distributors make newsgathering marketable. Without them the development of the modern newspaper would be checked and thwarted."

The new paper is illustrated with half-tones of persons interesting to news dealers. Mike Cronin, selling papers at the age of 91, dean of newspaper sellers, has front page position and tells a story of how he sold papers in the sixties and once shook hands with Lincoln.

Another feature tells of Alex Solomon, crippled news-dealer of lower Manhattan, who has educated his daughter Rose in music and has proudly seen her give two recitals at Aeolian Hall. She is a graduate of Hunter High school.

The little paper is filled with news of sound interest to those who live by selling papers, such as a list of stands given out in 1925 by the License Department, the facts concerning the hold-over commissioner of licenses, and stories of news dealers who have made a success of life.

Staff Honors Publisher

Employes of the Birmingham (Ala.) News entertained at a banquet in the ballroom of the Tutwiler Hotel, Dec. 29, honoring Victor Hanson, publisher, and Mrs. Hanson. H. W. Dearing, cashier, was toastmaster. A watch was presented to E. R. Calhoun, proofreader, in recognition of his 24 years' service with the paper.

Aiding Reforestation Work

Charles M. Barnes, editor of the Wellsville (N. Y.) Reporter has joined with several other editors of New York State in the taking of an active interest in the reforestation movement. Mr. Barnes, who has long encouraged the tree-planting idea, has ordered 10,000 trees to begin reforesting an area of 100 acres.

Plans New Connecticut Weekly

About Editors' Feature Service

We can "toot" a very nifty horn about Editors' Feature Service, but we much prefer to have others, expert in their line as news and feature editors, express their opinion of it.

In our morning's mail came the following from an interested observer—not yet a client. His letter was addressed to another interested editor. We thank both publicly for providing us with excellent as well as truthful advertising copy. The editor says:

"We have been watching it (The Editors' Feature Service) very closely, and from indications it will develop into a great service. The cuts give indication of being about the best in the country in mat service.

"The editorial page features and the news pictures now appear to surpass the same in other services of its kind. The woman's page features also are very good. I believe that there is a demand for it and a need for it."

James W. Irwin, Managing Editor of the Madison, Wisconsin State Journal, a client, says:

"Congratulations upon the first releases of your splendid service. Your features are all winners and insure a newspaper of increased prestige in its territory."

It is a matter of professional pride with us to make of Editors' Feature Service the very best of its kind—fine in quality, of compelling interest, and excellently arranged to meet the daily needs of our clients.

BRAINS, EXPERIENCE, MONEY WILL DO IT.

We have employed the first and with it have secured a wholehearted and interested cooperation which makes them function more satisfactorily and profitably.

Experience we have acquired with the brains.

Financially we are sound.

We believe that a superior service, well rendered, will bring to our clients a satisfactory connection and to us a profitable alliance.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

MUNSEY CHOSE WISELY

"IT is to be hoped that Frank A. Munsey's friends are right in saying that he intended to revise his will and to provide that the men who had worked so long for the upbuilding of his publications should have opportunity of purchasing them favorably at his death. That would have been as little as could have been done by a man who had no direct heirs to carry on his enterprises. Mr. Munsey had been well served by those who worked for him, though he was not liked by most other newspaper men. They always remembered that when he purchased a paper for consolidation with those he already owned, he dismissed nearly all the staff without notice and with only two weeks' pay.

"All this apart, Mr. Munsey was very wise in his choice of a residuary legatee. The Metropolitan Museum is no longer New York's, but America's, and it is rapidly becoming the world's."—Richmond (Va.) News-Leader.

STORE UP USEFUL FACTS!

"NO man will ever succeed in the newspaper business on inspiration and instinct alone. He must store his mind with useful facts. There is nothing that does not add to one's knowledge on a newspaper. And one cannot expect to succeed without hard work. There are many who have not succeeded, because they lacked the power of application, though otherwise gifted."—Dr. John B. Howe, Editor, Syracuse Herald.

ADVERTISING AND "THE AVERAGE MAN"

"WE make too much reference in our advertising to the 'average man.' I have never met the average man. I believe it is safe to say there is no such animal. When you write an advertisement for the average man you are almost certain to make a mistake. The man to whom the advertising man wants to write is the man he wants to sell."—Dr. Henry A. Burd, Professor of Advertising, University of Washington.

PRESS POWER FOR GOOD AND EVIL

"THE press is the greatest power for good and for evil in the world today according to its deliberate efforts to effect the right or accomplish the wrong. The press in America at its best distinguishes clearly between forming public opinion and conforming to it. In the creation of news values it discriminates conscientiously between what the public is entitled to know and what an individual has a right to keep private. Aware that it constantly has to deal with the crusted prejudices of the compact majority and the cohesiveness of the herd, it undertakes to inject moral and spiritual motives into public opinion in a laudable effort to convert uninformed and misinformed public opinion into public conscience."—Rev. A. C. Fox, President, Marquette University, Milwaukee.

NEWSPAPER SEEKING TRAINED MEN

"THE demand by newspapers for graduates of schools of journalism has never been greater, in my 20 years' experience in teaching journalism, than it is today. The complexity of the problems of life today demands, these editors are realizing, that newspapers obtain the best-trained writers and editors that are available. Society cannot afford to be the victim of the immature, half-educated newspaper reporters or correspondents."—Prof. William G. Bleyer, Director, Department of Journalism, University of Wisconsin.

NEWSPAPER CHARACTER

"GOOD character is a precious thing. It is not easily acquired, nor maintained without a daily struggle against temptation. No business is subjected to such a multiplicity of changing contacts with the public, such shifting problems, calling for immediate decisions, as newspapers. But the simple element of character in a newspaper remains fixed, and can be easily identified by the reader and advertiser. It is honesty in news and advertising."—Louis Wiley, Business Manager, New York Times.

SEVEN GROUP MEETINGS

Press Associations Open Year With Meets in Various Sections

Seven winter meetings of daily and weekly press associations are scheduled for this week-end and the early part of next week, opening a year of great activity for the editors and publishers who are seeking solutions of problems confronting them.

The North Carolina Press Association, J. W. Atkins, president, is holding its annual institute at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill; the Virginia Press Association, W. S. Copeland, president, is in a two days' session at Farmville; the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Casper S. Yost, president, is in session at the New Willard, Washington; the Oklahoma Press Association, Clyde Muchmore, president, is concluding a two days' session at Oklahoma City, and the Colorado Editorial Association, John N. Green, president, is finishing a two days' session at Denver.

Monday the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers Association, John L. Stewart, president, convenes in a two day session at Harrisburg, and the New England Press Association, James T. Murray, president, meets in Boston on Tuesday.

New York "Specials" Plan Luncheon

The Six Point League, New York organization of publishers representatives, will open the 1926 season with a luncheon at the Advertising Club of New York, Jan. 20.

Helen Keller, author and lecturer of national fame, will write a daily article (six a week, approximately 500 words each) entitled INTO THE LIGHT.

Although deaf and blind since babyhood, Helen Keller has accomplished the seemingly impossible. She is one of the most highly educated women in America today—the only well educated deaf and blind person in the world.

From her silent darkness she points out happiness and beauty, showing the true light that has been lost in the glitter of things artificial.

Her thoughts, highly optimistic and intensely modern, have ripened in an undisturbed world and are not influenced by the rush of life as seeing persons know it.

Miss Keller holds fast to things fundamental. Through her pen come help, cheer and sound philosophy touching problems of everyday life and current topics.

This feature—absolutely unique—is the first Miss Keller has written for newspapers.

With Increased Population

THE SOUTH

Offers Great Sales Possibilities

The buying power of any locality rests upon the foundation of wealth. The wealth of The South is rapidly multiplying because of the steady influx of desirable folks who are following the trend of industrial development, agricultural advancement and other unusually prosperous conditions that have attracted them to this land of increasing promise with the determination to establish themselves as permanent citizens.

The rate of increase in population among the Southern States in many cases exceeds the country's average of 15% and this increase is evident in all of the states listed below.

Although the new arrivals are settling for the most part in cities, the greater part of the Southern population are residents of villages and farm lands. Agriculture therefore still is an important factor in the maintenance of this great territory.

The opportunities of The South, that have so substantially increased its population, are at the disposal of the manufacturer who desires a market of increasing demands and substantial purchasing power in which to distribute his product.

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

Bliven's Columbia Speech

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I have read with interest, not to say excitement, the editorial entitled "Three Pearls" in EDITOR & PUBLISHER for Jan. 9. Because I agree so wholeheartedly with most of what you say, I hope you will permit me a word of comment on your interpretation of what I was supposed to have said at the banquet of the American Association of Teachers of Journalism. I take it that your remarks are based on a one-paragraph newspaper summary of my remarks, a summary which quite failed to give an adequate conception of the idea I was trying to get across.

I addressed myself strictly to the question whether or not, for the rank and file, newspaper work is a profession comparable to law or medicine or engineering. I specifically excluded from consideration newspaper executives, magazine writers, star reporters, columnists, and everyone else except the average working reporter and copy desk man. I suggested three standard tests which ought to apply to any truly professional career and stated that in my opinion the work of the ordinary reporter or copy desk man does not measure up to them.

For instance, the observation for which you reproach me, that the newspaper worker "does not stand on his own legs" referred strictly to the fact that newspaper work of this grade is anonymous, and that such anonymity is incompatible with the standards of true professional activity. Again, it is true, as you say, that plenty of newspaper men possess a body of expert knowledge. But their expert knowledge is not of journalism. It is of municipal politics, or international affairs, or labor matters. It is certainly not a body of common knowledge which must be acquired by every competent practitioner, as is the case with the lawyer or doctor.

Every working journalist knows that, for the group of men I was discussing the rewards, financial and spiritual, do not continue to increase throughout the span of the working life. The most casual inquiry will show you that for these men, maximum earning power usually comes within five or ten years after they take up newspaper work. As for increasing spiritual rewards—ask them!

These details, however, are unimportant. My chief objection to that part of your editorial which referred to my speech is that it assumed I was being critical of journalism as a life work. This is far from the truth. I said that "I for one regard it as the best occupation I know anything about." I said, "No occupation has greater possibilities for social service." My remarks were devoted purely to the question whether or not journalism, fascinating as it may be—and is—to its practitioners, is entitled to be called, for the average reporter or copy reader, a profession. To this I said the answer is No. I am cheerfully willing to be criticized in the columns of EDITOR & PUBLISHER; but I should like to be criticized, not for views which I don't maintain, but for those I do.

Sincerely,
BRUEL BLIVEN.

The comment upon Mr. Bliven's address was based upon the report of the representative of EDITOR & PUBLISHER and others among Mr. Bliven's audience, none of whom noted the exclusions and qualifications to which Mr. Bliven refers in his letter. His statement that he did make such qualifications is accepted without question.

Mr. Bliven finds that the average working reporter and desk man, the rank and file of newspaper men, are not professional men as are the doctors, lawyers, and engineers. Their work is anonymous; they possess expert knowledge, he admits, but that body of expert knowledge is not of journalism, but of several other things; and their rewards, financial and spiritual, do not continue to increase throughout the span of the working life.

Let the charge be examined. Compare the rank and file of working newspaper men with the rank and file of doctors, lawyers, and engineers. The reporter takes his assignment, writes his story, reads it in the paper which carries in its masthead, not his name, but that of the publisher and the editor. The wheelhorse lawyer takes his assignment, digs out precedents and delves into the human and mechanical aspects of the case in hand, and turns over his labors to be argued publicly by a barrister whose specialty is a convincing or winsome manner with the jury box. The engineer of the rank and file is directed to draw the plans and calculate the stresses and strains of a bridge-span, or the floor of a press-room, or even the tower of a skyscraper. His reward is a weekly salary; his labors are turned to the financial and spiritual rewards of his chief. The rank and file physician wins neither fame nor great fortune by his battles against disease and injury; not infrequently he is the foundation for the famed skill of the specialist and surgeon.

Yet the engineer and the physician and the lawyer mentioned all call themselves professional men and we find ourselves in agreement. Doubtless Mr. Bliven would also agree. Anonymity is not incompatible with professional dignity.

Analogy can also be used to answer the argument that the newspaper man's expert knowledge is not of journalism, but of municipal politics, labor, or international affairs, etc. What, in Heaven's name, is journalism, if it is not knowledge of human affairs and the ability to write about them understandingly? Would Mr. Bliven have the lawyers confine their knowledge to the minutiæ of Blackstone and the Napoleonic Code and bar them from professional status because they knew intimately the details of the newspaper business, or the steel industry? Is the great surgeon any less the doctor because his skill lies in the use of the knife or the X-Ray rather than the contents of materia medica? Admitted it is that the professional conception of journalism is recent. Certainly it is held by those newspaper men whose standing among their fellows is comparable to that of the doctors, lawyers and engineers who seem to have been in Mr. Bliven's mind when he spoke.

There is no great gap between the reporting staff, the copy desk and the specialist, the columnist, and the executive. The files of the latter three are recruited daily from the ranks of the first two. There is no great ado over the transition. It is one of the realities of our business that the rank-and-file reporter's work is a young man's job. The rewards, spiritual and financial, do not continue to increase for the men who do not continue to show increasing skill and a widening range of knowledge. The same applies to law, medicine, or the clergy.

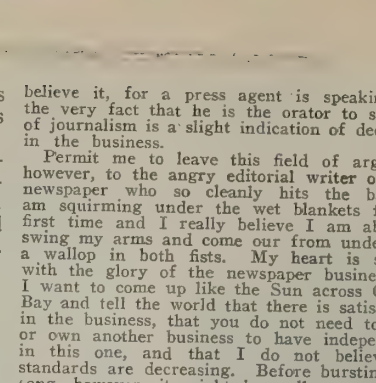
Newspaper Critics Answered

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—The elder Pulitzer is quoted as saying he didn't give a damn for an editorial writer who could not get angry, and somebody on the EDITOR & PUBLISHER has been getting angry. One can almost believe that a man making a speech on the newspaper business or writing an article on it will in the near future give some thought to his spoken or written words. For some years sodden wet blankets have been dropped on the massed heads and shoulders of the reporters of the nation and there has not been a stir. Somehow the men who get the news went right ahead getting it and writing it. They became angry about many things, but never about the fellows who were continually dropping the wet blankets. With the crash of the quick thunder and the brilliancy and illumination of lighting, somebody on the EDITOR & PUBLISHER has been calling the critics to account, and I, for one, am willing to add a few plain truths from everyday experience to the nailing of the silly theories and wailings of the sob-brothers.

The important reason for striking out and striking out hard at this moment is that recently the blanket dreppers have been circling over heads and shoulders of students of journalism, young men and women who are likely to spend years recovering the enthusiasm which a kindly nature has given to inexperienced youth. When these students are told to learn another business in order to acquire independence in the newspaper business it is akin to telling a girl about to be married that she had better learn stenography to be independent of her husband. When they are told there is no satisfaction in the newspaper life they are told that the hope and ambition which carried them so far is already a dead hope and a false ambition. When they are told by a press agent that the standards of journalism are decreasing there is no alternative but to believe it, for a press agent is speaking and the very fact that he is the orator to students of journalism is a slight indication of decadence in the business.

Permit me to leave this field of argument however, to the angry editorial writer on your newspaper who so cleanly hits the ball. I am squirming under the wet blankets for the first time and I really believe I am about to swing my arms and come our from under with a wallop in both fists. My heart is singing with the glory of the newspaper business and I want to come up like the Sun across China's Bay and tell the world that there is satisfaction in the business, that you do not need to learn or own another business to have independence in this one, and that I do not believe the standards are decreasing. Before bursting into song, however, it might be well to say, sotto voice, that Mr. Bliven was probably feeling the lack of satisfaction from not being in the newspaper business in its daily sense, and that no one will thrill more than he will when he recalls the stirring days when he stood on the deck on the New York Globe and made decisions by the minute with Jason Rogers, with McCann, and with a dozen other executives who saw the paper growing day by day. And now for the glory of the job!

Who ever saw Frank Cobb come bounding into the editorial rooms of the Evening World at four o'clock in the afternoon humming and happy, to suddenly encounter a tale of injustice in a ten line telegraph or cable message? Who remembers that cigar gripped hard in his teeth and that face tighten up? Who will ever forget his sudden shout to somebody for the rest of that story? And who will ever forget the editorial of the next morning? In a day he had transformed some helpless nobody into an issue with a whole nation ranged to take sides. Frank Cobb died poor, but if there was no satisfaction in Cobb's day's work then the great God of the universe can't get much kick out of his.



And we need not stop at editorial writers or at New York for the things that make us feel glad to be newspaper men. A couple of Chicago reporters solved the most scandalous murder mystery of the year 1924 in Chicago, a man down in Texas exposed crooked road contracts involving millions and enabled the state to recover millions of dollars, the peonage system of Florida was exposed to the world in its naked bloodiness a few years ago. These are but a few of the highlights. Reporters went to the rim of the world with Amundsen and would have gone beyond, but permission was not given them. A thousand cubs now are nervously wondering if they dare ask to get an assignment to fly over the North Pole the next time such a trip is attempted. There is not a thing any man in the world will do in the serious interest of science that a reporter will not volunteer to go along with him, and, thank God, there isn't a serious thing attempted in the advancement of civilization that does not find a reporter on the job. Is there no satisfaction in this?

And in the humbler matters of life you will find the seeds of satisfaction. Jay Racusin, of the New York Herald Tribune, grew a long beard and went down into the ghetto as a licensed push-cart peddler. For days he sold suspenders, onions, and shoestrings and he learned. He found market inspectors grafting a quarter and fifty cents from peddlers who were trying to raise large families on small incomes, he found other grafters of the political type who helped themselves to the peddler's goods. He wrote the story, he gave articulation to the bewilderment and the sorrow of the poor men who came to these shores looking for honor and freedom and whose ideals of America and dreams of the future for their children were being smashed by cheap grafters. Racusin started out in life to be a banker, and he would have been a great banker, but ask him if he does not find satisfaction in the newspaper business.

As to decisions in the newspaper business, they are the most essential factors in the day's work. Every cub is called upon to decide who is right and who is wrong in instance after instance. In a controversial story two lies may be printed, but somehow the story seems to point the truth. In reporting on such a story, and on stories of many other characters, every reporter tells his city editor what he thinks of the principals in the case. A man who ventured into the office with every word from both sides and proceeded to cram that down the throat of his city editor would find a pretty critical hard-boiled individual looking him over and wondering what kind of a damn fool he was anyway?

And the necessity for decision does not stop there. It begins the moment a mental review of the facts is concluded. Every man in the business is compelled at that moment to ask himself whether or not he has a story. He is then compelled to ask whether he has it all and whether or not it is accurate. And if he fails he is compelled to decide whether or not he has a job.

Decision making merely begins with the reporter. The process passes on to the city editor, and it goes on to the managing editor, and to the editorial writer who considers it ethically. We are going to forget here such outstanding characters as William Allen White and we are going to ask the critics if they ever heard that Al Bergener, of Cleveland, didn't have to make decisions every minute. How about Jim Crown down at New Orleans, Boyd Gurley out in South Bend, and dozens of others throughout the country. And as for editors above the rank of the city desk making decisions I can never forget Harvey Burrell, in Syracuse, throwing an old Republican newspaper to the support of a Democratic candidate because he thought he was right and risking his entire personal fortune in the decision. The critics can hardly be acquainted with Francis B. Mitchell, now 80 years old, who never in 60 years in the newspaper business made a decision that was influenced in the slightest degree by his personal advantage or disadvantage.

On the Evening Mail years ago Mitchell risked thousands on doing right, and in later years when his fortune of many millions was made he conducted the Rochester Post-Express on the same principle. He never accepted a patent medicine advertisement, he rejected all financial advertising that came from houses he would personally hesitate to do business with, and he printed not all the news that's fit to print, but all that news that was worth printing. He tried made-over automobile tires on his farm automobiles some years ago and, finding they did not measure up to the advertisements, he threw out $30,000 worth of such advertising. He lost money on the Post-Express, but he remained Francis B. Mitchell, editor, and he got a thrill in every working hour.

And in a kindly closing note may I endeavor to explain some of the sad notes of the critics. I believe a man must remain on the firing line to get anything like satisfaction out of the newspaper business. He must remain with the vision ahead, the smoke of battle overhead, and the feeling of supreme confidence in his high command in the rear, the departed spirits of America's great newspaper men. It may be hard, after you have won your way to high executive place, to match salaries with bankers and lawyers and real estate men, and to play golf with them on an equal social and somewhat unequal financial footing, but after all think of the fun you had, and the fun they missed.

JOSEPH A. BRADY.

Datelines in the Old Herald

TO EDITOR AND PUBLISHER:

I was much interested in the "Useless Datelines" letter to you from Max Hahn, of the Toledo Blade. If Mr. Hahn is interested only in saving space he puts up a good argument apparently, but the gains he proposes to make will be negligible, for leads and other makeup expediencies will very much reduce the gain effected by saving half a line here and there.

If he could effect the saving of space in one or two continuous articles he might gain something, but only at the cost of bewildering the reader. Most readers want to know with reference to an item which interests them something about where it came from, when and possibly how. I know that I do and I know that many other persons may be of the same mind. Of the 153 items in the Blade as mentioned only one might interest any particular reader, but he or she would want to know just the information that Mr. Hahn would eliminate.

James Gordon Bennett on the Herald for a long time dated out of town with full details, as below:

TOLEDO, January 9, 1926.—An important development in the, etc.

Later, after a shyster lawyer had used a clipping of an item so dated he changed over to the style:

TOLEDO, Tuesday.—Shyster lawyers often are troublesome to, etc.

But the final style was this:

TOLEDO, January 9.—Shyster lawyers often inconvenience newspapers, but they will do it anyway, while the matter of convenience of reference for ourselves and the information given to our readers, reducing the number of inquiries for additional facts, saving time and trouble, has more than offset the attempts of ambulance chasers and other petty blackmailers to annoy us.

NOTE.—These Toledo dispatches are simply paraphrases of originals in my archives. But they tell the story.

EDWARD W. DREW.

Comments from Australia

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: The publicity concerning Editor Magee and Ex-Judge Leahy is astounding to Australian eyes.

In the United States of Australia any comments or criticism such as appeared in EDITOR & PUBLISHER on Aug. 29, would cause the editor and the writer to be committed for contempt of court. That means that the editor and writer would be brought before the Supreme Court Judge and either sent to jail for six months or be fined $1,000. The idea is that every man is judged innocent until found guilty after trial by jury.

For instance, as an unbiased person in the case of Magee and Leahy I have a very strong opinion in favour of Magee. It does not matter how much Leahy may have been in the wrong there is the other side of the case which must be considered and it is a fundamental out here that ex-parte statements must always be accepted with caution.

Your continued criticisms regarding the publicity agents are always interesting but from an Australian point of view I do not quite share your reasoning. For instance there are very few papers here which would not publish gratuitously any effort to awaken the public conscience, and if the shoes of the Australian need polishing, and it can be proved to the satisfaction of the editors that well-shod Australians with brightly polished shoes were more efficient than down-at-heel chaps, then that campaign would go over even though it did benefit the manufacturer's shoe polish.

For instance quite recently one of our papers gave columns and columns in an "Eat more fruit" campaign in order that the orange growers particularly should be able to get their fruit sold. Now the orange growers here are absolutely an unorganized crowd and I do not think that they spend one single shilling in advertising.

There is little charity or philanthropic advertising here. The papers give the news graciously and gladly to make known the needs of suffering humanity. There are no publicity agents and there are not any big salaries. There is very little community or trade propaganda.

At the same time prizes are given on the same scale as they are in America. Without hesitation I would say that no publicist here would do as Ivy Lee did and pay an income tax of $28,000. I would say there is no publicist here who is earning $28,000 a year. By a publicist I do not mean an advertising agent or space seller because I know one, admittedly the most successful man in his field who earns up to the equivalent of $75,000. The average man who has a media and can produce results would earn about $10,000 per annum

May I say how much I admire the splendid tone of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER, its ideals and ideas are certainly inspiring.

"LETTERS TO THE EDITOR" COLUMN IS BRITISH PRESS-AGENT'S PLAYGROUND

Space-Moochers Start Controversies to Exploit Clients' Products—It's the Same Old Game in England But Not Quite So Brassy

By G. F. WILKINSON

LONDON, Jan. 5.—EDITOR AND PUBLISHER'S weekly exposé of the ways of the American space-moocher make interesting reading in this country. Press agentry here is not organized on such elaborate and expensive lines in the provision of mats and cuts, but in many ways the English free publicity merchants appear to be even more wily than their United States brothers. There is probably a larger proportion of English editors who fall for advertising disguised as news than American.

One of the biggest fields for the British space-moocher is the "Letters to the Editor" column in the small circulation weekly newspapers published in the provinces. Well-known persons on the stage and in society are used as pawns in the game by the press agent.

The usual method is to get them to send letters to the press in which the advertisement is cunningly disguised, and it is amazing how many s nall editors are attracted by the idea of having a famous name in their correspondence and thus join hands with the space-snatcher.

Several big London dailies were hocussed during the recent "Eat More Fruit" campaign by the psuedo-letter writers. Miss Peggy O'Neil, the well-known musical comedy actress, began by asking in a letter sent broadcast to the press what she should give her friends for Christmas gifts, concluding by expressing her own partiality for a plain barrel of pippins.

A British general and a well-known health expert came into the scheme later on. Simultaneously another London daily was treating its readers to a discussion on "Dogs that Eat Fruit," "Fruit in the Schoolboy's Diet," and so on, and then somebody came along with a tale about the precise number of vitamins in apples, pears and peaches. Still not content, the press agent sent a letter to the paragraphist on one of the most respected of London dailies asking the best way to make the good old Dickensian rum-punch, and after the unsuspecting paragraphist had quoted it his post-bag was full of suggestions from which it seemed that the only essential ingredient was lemons.

More astonishing still is the alacrity with which small town editors fill up their columns with bunk like the following, which is broadcast throughout the country by the gas associations:

SHAKESPEARE'S KITCHEN

GAS COOKER INSTALLED IN ANNE HATHAWAY'S COTTAGE

I am reminded of Shakespeare's loathing of smoke, which was so prevalent in his time (writes a correspondent) by the discovery I have just made that in "Anne Hathaway's Cottage," at Stratford-on-Avon, a gas cooker has been fitted in an alcove off the kitchen. The poet's antipathy to smoke is the subject of vigorous metaphor in "Henry IV";

"O, he's as tedious
As a tired horse, a railing wife;
Worse than a smoky house——."

Shakespeare's impatience with the smoky room may be understood and excused when it is recollected that he was only 18 when he married Anne in 1582. But doubtless both he and Anne would have readily sacrificed the future metaphor if a gas-cooker could have then replaced the wood fire in the ill-ventilated, if picturesque, confines of the cottage.

I have checked up two and three full columns of free advertising of this style, and in many cases the newspapers running it carry no paid advertising from the firms who put it across them.

Some of the press agents' greatest "triumphs" are scored on the picture pages of the London dailies. There is a favorite photograph that re-appears at regular intervals showing the crowds of shoppers in the big West End shopping centers of Kensington High street, Oxford street or Regent street. Sometimes the caption-writer is hard put to it to find a decent title, but he usually gets away with: "In spite of the inclement conditions crowds of fair shoppers, intent on the alluring bargains displayed in the windows of the stores in Kensington High street, thronged the pavement," or "Women shoppers, attracted by the glorious weather and the promise of bargains, in Oxford street yesterday."

Anything of news value in a London store is invariably played to the limit on the illustrations page. If a customer falls off the roof garden the subject must be treated with two large cuts and an inset. When a new wing is opened the newspaper reader is shown a view from the front, close-ups of the ornamental masonry, and heads of the proprietor, the architect, and the department manager.

RE-ENTERS DAILY FIELD

Yuma (Ariz.) Herald Had Published as a Weekly for 30 Days

The Yuma (Ariz.) Herald, which recently suspended as a daily, has re-entered the daily field after 30 days' publication as a weekly. The revived daily started with four 6-column pages and United Press pony service.

The editor-manager of the Herald is G. W. Lynn, against whom criminal libel charges instituted by E. F. Sanguinetti, Yuma millionaire merchant and rancher, were dismissed just before daily publication ceased. In a box statement appearing in the Weekly Herald the owners of the paper, announcing resumption of the daily, pledged "that the Herald cannot be silenced, bankrupted or put out of business until the farmers of the Yuma valley have been bankrupted."

Besides Lynn, the Evening Herald staff includes Jack Rowe, advertising manager; Mrs. Jane Finn, secretary; Mrs. C. B. Glasscock, society editor.

Paper Company Starts Reforestation

The Crown Willamette Paper Company, one of the big paper manufacturing concerns of the Pacific Coast, has begun an important campaign of reforestation. The company maintains a conifer nursery at West Linn, Ore., and trees from this are now being planted by a crew of 27 men on the company's cut-over land near Astoria. Within a few years this company expects to reforest its denuded areas as fast as the timber is cut off.

Letters That Speak for Themselves!

KANSAS CITY JOURNAL-POST
Kansas City, Mo.

For the last three years we have been using your service and cannot speak too highly f it as a means of saving annoyance to the publisher and securing prompt settlement f his accounts.

Your improved full service lightens our worries wonderfully and apparently is equally s satisfying to the advertising agencies. We consider your service a great step in dvance of the old system of sending out tear sheets from our office, and after having ed the Advertising Checking Bureau we would be loath to again return to the d system.

Particularly do we appreciate the careful co-operation from your offices in keeping our stomers satisfied, and it is with pleasure that we forward this word of recommendation. We are enthusiastic supporters of your system.

Your very truly,

CHEERFUL OUTLOOK IN ILLINOIS

FOR NATIONAL ADVERTISERS

One of the most cheerful features in the business situation in Illinois is that employment conditions were never better. A majority of manufacturing plants in the State have materially added to their forces recently, the ranks of the unemployed from this source alone being depleted by 6,000, says the report of the Illinois Department of Labor.

Trade conditions are very healthy and the outlook is regarded as good by all leading interests. Credit is in good supply, and from all appearances is being expanded to some extent in the manufacturing and mercantile industries.

This certainly indicates a cheerful outlook for National Advertisers who will distribute their merchandise in this territory during the coming year.

Do not neglect the most important feature of your campaign—deliver your sales talk directly to the consumer through his daily newspaper.

Campbell Soup Starts Newspaper Test—General Motors Increases Appropriation to Dailies—American Tobacco to Introduce New Brand

WITH the new year commences the first real test of newspaper space since 1915 by the Campbell Soup Company of Camden, N. J. For the past 10 years the advertising of this firm has been an exclusive magazine account.

H. F. Jones, advertising manager, questioned by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, declined to give specific details regarding the newspaper campaign, other than that he expected to give that medium a "comprehensive trial." He denied the newspaper appriation totaled $800,000 as reported in New York advertising circles.

"At present," he said, "we intend using dailies in about 12 cities. As to plans of extending this number, we are studying our markets first and the selection of newspapers will follow."

The institutional program of the General Motors Corporation, hitherto confined to magazines, is now also going into the newspapers on a large scale, Barton, Durstine & Osborn, New York advertising agency handling the account, announced this week.

A test of newspaper space was made last fall when 150 metropolitan dailies were used. This special campaign marked the first use of newspaper advertising columns made by General Motors for its institutional copy. During 1926, the newspaper list will be "considerably larger," an agency official informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He declined to make public the exact extent of he schedule. The magazine appropriation will continue approximately the same, without any increase.

Half and Half Smoking Tobacco, a new brand just brought out by the American Tobacco Company will be put on the market shortly. The advertising of this brand has been placed with the New York office of Dorrance, Sullivan & Co., who also handle for this company the advertising of Herbert Tareyton Cigarettes and have handled during the past two years the advertising of Tuxedo Smoking Tobacco.

C. Walter Dearden, sales promotion manager of the Strathmore Paper Company, of Mittineague, Mass., has resigned to become secretary and sales manager of the Rourke-Eno Paper Company, of Hartford, Conn. Mr. Dearden was a founder of the Association of National Advertisers and the originator of the slogans, "Paper Does Express," and "Paper is Part of the Picture." He was also founder of the Advertising Club of Springfield and served as president and vice-president of that organization.

He served for 24 years with the Strathmore Paper Company, starting in their employ as a stenographer. Three years later he was promoted to advertising manager, a position he held until his resignation. He introduced the manufacture of the first combined mill sample books ever issued and invented the Strathmore cabinet and the company's "color grammar."

The Lane Company, manufacturers of Lane Cedar Chests, of Altavista, Va., are planning an even larger advertising appropriation for 1926 than they spent in 1925 advertising their product. Lane Chests have been very extensively advertised in national magazines for the last three years. The year 1925, the company announces, was the most successful in its 13 years' history. The company has let contracts for new additions and equipment that will cost in the neighborhood of $130,000. The work began on Jan. 4 and is to be completed by May 1. The present output of the company is about $1,500,000 annually; this it hopes to increase to $3,000,000.

At a meeting of the board of directors of L. C. Smith and Corona Typewriters, Inc., the new name of the merger of the L. C. Smith and Corona Typewriter companies, held at Syracuse this week, the number of directors was increased to fifteen by the election of five to represent the Corona interests. The new directors are Samuel G. H. Turner, President of the Second National Bank of Elmira, N. Y.; Carlton F. Brown and Lawrence J. Conger of Croton, N. Y.; Thomas H. Dinsmore and Theodore S. Kenyon of New York.

The officials of the new organization are as follows:

Wilbert L. Smith, Chairman of the Board; Frank R. Ford, President; Francis E. Van Buskirk, Vice President; Schuyler C. Stivers, Vice President and Secretary; Carlton F. Brown, Vice President; Lawrence J. Conger, Vice President; B. C. Milner Jr., assistant to the President; William H. Haun, Treasurer.

Earnings of the Onyx Hosiery Company for 1925 increased over those of the previous year, due to the record-breaking holiday trade. The annual report covering operations for the full year is expected shortly. Figures for the nine months ended Sept. 30, however, show net profit of $588,164, which after preferred dividends is equal to $2.60 a share earned on the common stock. This compares with a deficit of $85,254 in the same period of 1924.

Gordon K. MacEdward, formerly sales manager of Walker & Co., outdoor advertising, Detroit, has been appointed advertising manager of the Frischkorn Florida Company, owners of a 3,000 acre development at Dunedin, Fla., on the West Coast. This company is using newspapers, outdoor advertising and circular matter in the South and will soon extend these to the North.

A five year advertising campaign is being planned by the Japan Tea Promotion Committee to start within the next few months. The J. Walter Thompson Company will handle the account.

The Murphy Varnish Company, Newark, has started an advertising campaign on Murphy's Brushing Lacquer, a new product. Calkins & Holden, Inc., is placing the business.

F. X. Wholley who joined the Barnet Leather Co., Inc., of New York, as advertising manager following his leaving Washington, where he represented organized advertising for several years, has been made assistant to the president in charge of advertising and selling.

Mr. Wholley also directs the advertising and merchandising of the Northwestern Leather Co. Trust, makers of "ELKO" and is preparing campaigns for an increased amount of advertising for both companies.

Gridley Adams has been appointed director of advertising for the Key Largo City Properties, Fla.

R. M. Vandivert, formerly associated with the national advertising division of the Hearst newspaper organization, has been appointed advertising and sales promotion manager of the fabrikoid division of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., with headquarters in Newburgh, N. Y.

The Palmolive Company used New York newspapers recently in a test campaign for its new shaving talc for after shaving purposes.

The Chamberlain Medicine Company, Des Moines, Ia., is conducting a newspaper campaign for its cough remedy.

Arthur J. Brewster, former newspaper man and advertising manager of the L. C. Smith & Brothers Typewriter Company, Inc., has resigned the latter position to enter the advertising agency field. He has been with the typewriter concern for the past 13 years. He held reportorial and editorial positions on Syracuse newspapers prior to entering the advertising field. Mr. Brewster will continue as head of the advertising and selling department of the College of Business Administration at Syracuse University, which position he has held for six years.

City Editor Steps Up

Blaine Gibson, for two years city editor of the Pasadena (Cal.) Evening Post has been promoted to managing editor of that newspaper which is the "mother" of the F. W. Kellogg chain of 16 newspapers in Southern California. Mr. Gibson is a graduate of the School of Journalism, University of Missouri. He entered the Kellogg organization five years ago.

PLANS FOR MUNSEY NEW YORK PAPERS

)per stories and a dining room on top. ewart learned something about this, and e also learned that the Second Con-egational Church in New London was oking for a first class tenor for its iartet.

Attractive as the combination sounded, e was no person to go out chasing wild ese. His first proceeding was to seek s friend, Charles J. Brown, a Rochester irseryman, and ask him what was to be own about that man Munsey. After nsulting Dun and Bradstreet Mr. rown reported that "that man Munsey" as a pretty good risk—said he was vell rated and growing." Mr. Dewart mediately wrote an application for a)b and mailed it to Mr. Munsey in ew York.

Mr. Munsey replied promptly, ad-sing him that the application had been rwarded to the local manager of the ohican Company in New London. T(is manager the young man at once nt impressive references.

The response was discouraging. The ferences were excellent, but the man-ger thought Mr. Dewart too young—he as then but 22. Mr. Dewart thereupon ought a railroad ticket for New London here he met Erman J. Ridgway, gen-al manager of the Munsey concerns. r. Dewart got a job which paid only 2 a week to start.

His first task was to straighten out hat Mr. Dewart calls "the worst set books I ever tackled,"and to make an ventory. He did it so well that in urse of time he was transferred to New ork, where he was assigned to one of any sets of books in the Red Star ews Company at No. 141 East Twenty-th street, a distributing organization for e Munsey publications. Mr. Ridgway und him a boarding house at No. 70 exington avenue, and got an engage-ent as singer in the choir at St. Bar-olomew's Church.

Mr. Munsey carried most of his busi-ss affairs in his head, and thought his nployees should be able to do likewise. hen he asked for information he wanted prompt and ready answer. Mr. Dewart ade a record book for Mr. Ridgway orking at night, and with this it was ssible to keep pace with Mr. Munsey's uestions. That book developed into a st system which is today used almost iversally in business.

For about 18 months Mr. Dewart's erage working day was from 8 in the orning to midnight. In rapid succession became head bookkeeper of the Red ar News Company, assistant superin-ndent of the manufacturing plant and ditor of the business.

When the Frank A. Munsey Company as incorporated in 1902 he was made easurer without bond.

Mr. Ridgway retired as general man-er in 1903 and Mr. Dewart was ap-inted to succeed him as vice-president, neral manager and treasurer. As news-pers were purchased he became vice-esident and general manager of the veral concerns.

On Christmas Day of 1907, he and Mr. unsey breakfasted together at the Union ague Club. The employer excused mself to write a letter. Returning with he asked Mr. Dewart to look it over at his leisure. Later in the day he opened the letter and this is what he read:

My dear Dewart:

This note is to wish you a Merry Christmas and to hope that the New Year will bring you continued good health and a large measure of happiness. It is also to tell you that your salary will be advanced from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars. This evidence will assure you of my confidence in you and my appreciation of your loyalty to my interests and to myself. I am glad to make you this advance, making it as I have made all increases in your salary during the years you have been with me, without solicitation or pressure, directly or indirectly, on your part. It would not be the same thing if at any time there had been a suggestion of compulsion about it. Merit usually names its own reward without direct or indirect seeking. Your advance over the heads of all others in the business, starting at $12 a week a few years ago, and at work of simple grade, tells its own story. I congratulate you warmly on this record. You have both my friendship and my best wishes.

Sincerely yours,
FRANK A. MUNSEY.

That was not the first signal token of Mr. Munsey's esteem. In 1880, when, as Mr. Munsey liked to say, a dollar looked to the future editor of the Sun "as big as the Palisades," he bought for himself a gold watch. When he was on his first trip to Europe in 1895 he bought a beautiful repeater. The old watch he gave to his father. The elder Munsey willed it back to him when he died in 1907. Meanwhile, in 1904, he presented Mr. Dewart with a watch—the latter's first. After an address to the Bankers Association in 1922 Mr. Munsey called Mr. Dewart aside and gave him the watch that he first purchased in 1880. The day after Mr. Munsey was taken to the hospital for what proved to be his final illness he also gave the repeater to Mr. and Mrs. Dewart jointly, saying he wanted them to have it for sentiment's sake and foor good luck.

Mr. Dewart has another article by which Mr. Munsey set even greater store—a diamond ring, the gold of which is made up in part of his mother's wedding ring. It passed to Mr. Dewart at the expressed desire of Mr. Munsey's sole surviving sister.

The friendship between the two men became more apparent than ever during the final days of the editor. At the hospital he was unwilling for Mr. Dewart to be away from him even for a short while, and would invariably ask for him on awakening.

One Sunday afternoon in September last, when Mr. Munsey was entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Dewart and other guests at Fort Ticonderoga, the host led his business manager to the door through which Allen and the Green Mountain Boys charged on that famous night when they wrested the place from its British garrison.

"Doesn't it just tear the heart out of you," Mr. Munsey said, "to think of the pride and courage of those New Englan boys, who had no fear of death and no other thought than—'My Country!'"

After dinner that evening, as the party sat on the veranda looking off to the gloom of the "friendly mountains," with their fringes of forests dimly discoverable in the starlight, Mr. Munsey asked Mr. Dewart to sing. He himself suggested these old hymns: "Rock of Ages," "Abide With Me" and "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

"They were my father's favorite hymns," he said, "and they are mine."

Those hymns were sung at Mr. Munsey's funeral.

Mr. Dewart was married on April 21, 1908, to Mary Louise, daughter of Commodore and Mrs. Thomas H. Wheeler. Mrs. Dewart, a graduate of Smith College and a lady of great charm, shared Mr. Munsey's esteem with her husband. They have three children—William T., Jr., and Thomas Wheeler, 16 and 15 years old respectively, students of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., and Mary, aged 10.

Mr. Dewart gave a luncheon Saturday to members of the New York Sun's advertising staff at the Metropolitan Club.

The luncheon was attended by 70 men of the Sun's advertising force, together with several executives of the Sun, and was the occasion for an expression of appreciation by Mr. Dewart of the splendid showing made by the staff during the past year, and especially during the past six months.

Mr. Dewart had intended giving the luncheon during the Christmas holidays, but on account of Mr. Munsey's death it was postponed. Edwin S. Friendly, business manager, read a number of letters from the most prominent people i nthe United States congratulating Mr. Dewart on his promotion to the presidency and expressing assurances of his ability to carry forward the work of the great publisher. H. B. Fairchild, advertising manager, spoke in high praise of his staff and of the new chief executive of the Sun.

Gilbert T. Hodges has been appointed a member of Mr. Dewart's executive staff. His position as advertising manager of the Frank A. Munsey Company, has been taken by Albert J. Gibney.

SAYS PRESS MUST STAY ON PUBLIC'S LEVEL

Morrow Sees Small Place for Leadership or Uplift in Newspaper Work —Commercialism Rightly Dominant

The newspaper of today is a commercial enterprise, serving a commercially minded people in a commercial age. That is the end and aim of its being. It has its warrant for existence from the people, it exists only with public favor, and it is physically impossible for it to rise higher than the source of its existence.

Thus Marco Morrow, assistant publisher of the Capper Farm Press, last Thursday gave journalism students at the Kansas State Agricultural College a realist's attitude toward the press and commercialism.

Mr. Morrow did not see any occasion for alarm in his view of the situation of journalism today.

"Let us have done with the lamentations of the Utopians over the commercialism of the press and with self deception and hypocrisy on the part of newspaper men," he urged.

The newspaper, he asserted, is a commercial institution because it is an integral part of a commercial civilization.

"It is still true," he explained, "that 'things are in the saddle' and the press, as is every other institution in the age of industrialism, is necessarily dominated by things. Business supports the press, business pays the fiddler, and in the end, business must be served."

Mr. Morrow supported his conclusions by telling of the establishment of a daily newspaper in Kansas City, the state's largest city. There, he said, leaders in social work, in the churches, in the schools, and in the business life of the city realized that they were handicapped because they had no newspaper—but it was the business men who obtained a paper for Kansas City.

Unless the student can be in sympathy with the primary function of the newspaper—the reflection of public sentiment, the championing of the spirit of the community—he shouldn't go in for newspaper work, Mr. Morrow declared. He urged those who would dally with the uplift to seek some other medium of expression. He averred that this was not cynicism, but sense, and that the journalist need not abandon idealism.

The journalist may and ought "to question every existing human institution," Mr. Morrow asserted.

"Yet," he continued, "knowing that he is neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, he may feel no divine call to undertake, single handed, the reformation of the world and the redemption of the race.

"The men who really help mankind move forward are the men who keep step with their fellows, elbow to elbow, and gently, almost imperceptibly, give the former urge.

"That, to my mind, is the function of the journalist. His material is humanity as it is, now, today."

In common with other business, newspaper making has accepted higher standards than those formerly in force, Mr. Morrow believes. He suspects, however, that "newspapers have become more honest just to the same extent that the rest of the commercial world has become more honest."

An instance of the manner in which standards move, the speaker adjured his hearers to remember that our ideas of what is "fit to print" change from year to year. "Personally," he said, "I can think of no happening that is not a fit subject for discussion, but everything depends upon how it is discussed.

"Filth in newspapers is not a question of subject matter but of treatment, and that is entirely up to the good taste and sense and decency of the editor.

"It is the duty of the newspaper man," Mr. Morrow continued, "to face realities, to realize his limitations, to keep his ideals, and to cultivate his judgment. With a mind a little more open and with a little greater faith he ought to be able better to discern the morrow. With a little greater courage than his fellows he ought to be able to face facts more fearlessly. And that's enough for one man to do.

"If he feels the urge of the prophet let him yet remember that as long as he is a newspaper man his station is in the market place, not as a retailer of gossip, not as a common scold, not as a scoffer and scorner, but as one of the laborers doing his chosen part in the world's work."

Sale of the Amarillo Daily News and the Amarillo Evening Post by Dr. J. E. Nunn and J. I. Nunn to Eugene Howe and associates of Atchison, Kan., owners of the Amarillo Daily Globe took place Monday, Jan. 11. The sale is as of Jan. 1. The consideration was $200,000.

The three papers are to be merged and a morning, evening and Sunday paper published. Associated with Mr. Howe is Wilbur C. Hawk of the Atchison (Kans.) Globe. He and Mr. Howe, son of Ed Howe, founded the Amarillo Globe two years ago.

Dr. Nunn founded the News 16 years ago. J. I. Nunn was general manager. The Nunns will return to private life.

Minnesota Publisher Dies

Howard Bratton, 52, founder and publisher of the Faribault (Minn.) Daily News, died Jan. 2, following a long illness. He was born in Xenia, O., and did his first newspaper work on the Xenia Herald. In 1905 he became city editor of the Springfield (O.) Sun. In 1907 he became managing editor and 1911, business manager and editor. Later he served as editorial writer for the Dayton News and in 1913 was named editor of the Dayton News League, owned by James M. Cox. He established the Faribault Daily News in 1914.

ASHBY DEERING

Veteran New York Telegraph Man Succumbs to Heart Attack

Ashby Deering, for nearly 20 years a member of the staff of the New York Morning Telegraph, died suddenly of heart disease January 12 at his home.

Mr. Deering, who was in his early fifties, had served on the New York Evening World and the New York Daily News. Subsequently he came to the Morning Telegraph and made himself one of the best known newspaper men in the theatrical district.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

Editors Feature Service Contracts with Dr. A. F. Currier—"Air News" Service Being Offered by Butman—Herriman Making New Sunday Page

DR. A. F. CURRIER has contracted with the Editors Feature Service, New York, to write daily medical articles, under the heading, "Health Talks." Dr. Currier once wrote for the old New York Globe, and recently his column has been handled by another syndicate. Offerings of the Editors Feature Service are distributed through Johnson Features, Inc., New York.

The same syndicate this week also announced Col Henry W. Bunn had been engaged to write editorials for newspaper use, and that R. W. Satterfield, news cartoonist, had joined the staff. Col. Bunn is a contributor to Atlantic Monthly, the Century Magazine, and other class periodicals.

Carl H. Butman, manager of the Washington Radio News Service, is now offering a new feature under the title 'Air News." Mr. Butman served in the U. S. Air Service as an information officer, and for several years represented Aviation, an aeronautical magazine, as Washington correspondent. He has also covered aeronautics for the Army and Navy Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

George Herriman, creator of "Krazy Kat," is now drawing a new Sunday comic page called "Us Husbands," for the King Features Syndicate, New York.

"Brothers-in-Law" by Darrell Mc Clure, is now being distributed nationally by the Premier Syndicate, New York.

Courtney Riley Cooper has written a series of articles on Buffalo Bill for the Bell Syndicate, Inc., New York.

Roy Q. Minton, night city editor of the Dallas Morning News, has joined with the King Features Syndicate as traveling representative in Texas, Oklahoma and Arkansas. Mr. Minton has been connected with the editorial department of the News for the last four years. Previous to that time he was for several years associated with his father, W. J. Minton, in the publication and management of the Sherman Daily Courier.

W. Boyce Morgan has joined Associated Editors, in Chicago office. He was formerly on the Chicago Daily Journal.

May Christie, English novelist, has compiled a serial of American life entitled "The Girl Who Dared," being handled by King Features Syndicate, New York.

She is the daughter of Dr. Dugald Christie, C. M. G., F. R. C. S., who was the chief medical adviser to the Chinese government and president of the British Medical Association of China for years. Dr. Christie is an author himself, having written several standard works on the Far East. She has an M. A. degree from the University of Edinburgh where she took honors in English and Philosophy. Coming to America, she obtained much newspaper experience as woman's editor of the Philadelphia Evening Ledger.

"Gasoline Alley" created by Frank King for the Chicago Tribune Syndicate won first place in a reader voting contest conducted recently by the Springfield (Mass.) Union to determine the paper's most popular feature.

BRITISH M.D.'S FROWN ON PRESS PUBLICITY

Penalty of Being "Struck from the Register" Awaits Those Who Advertise Themselves in News Columns

LONDON, Jan. 5.—At intervals a British medical practitioner finds the need for self-expression too strong for him and plays havoc with the etiquette of the profession by descanting his opinions into the columns of the press. The General Medical Council does not view such "unprofessional conduct" lightly, however, and as is shown by several recent cases in which doctors of standing have been "struck off the register" for allowing their names to be used in newspaper articles. It is prepared to take severe measures to uphold the dignity of the profession.

Broadly, the view of the Medical Council and the British Medical Association is that no objection can be taken to doctors giving information in articles or other newspaper contributions. To do so in signed articles, or to allow one's name to appear in connection with the published matter, is a form of advertising and is rigidly barred. The Council frowns upon the practice of doctors granting interviews to reporters or allowing their photographs to be reproduced in connection with news stories of important illnesses with which they may be concerned. The penalty of being "struck off" is a serious one to the doctor, meaning, among other consequences, that other medical men are not allowed to work with him.

An aged doctor who believes he has discovered a cure for consumption and has written articles about the treatment for a weekly paper is the central figure in the most recent case of this description. He was charged by the Council with "seeking to attract patients to himself and to promote his own professional advantage by associating himself with advertising through articles in a weekly journal, sending circular letters regarding the cure to persons not under his charge, endeavoring to induce doctors to use the cure for their patients, while refusing to disclose the formula to them."

His defense was that he was "intoxicated by the exuberance of his enthusiasm for this treatment," and when the editor of the paper approached him he considered he had a right, in the interests of humanity and the medical profession, to give information as to the remarkable results of the treatment, on the strict understanding that the names of the medical men engaged in it were not divulged. The disciplinary action of the Medical Council has not deterred the doctor, for he retorted that he would now be a free-lance and would be able to further the new treatment unhampered.

ANALYSES NEWSPAPERS' MERITS

H. L. Hawkins Gives Eight Reasons for Using Ad Space

Eight reasons for newspaper advertising were given recently by H. L. Hawkins of the advertising staff of the Philadelphia Bulletin:

1. Newspaper reading is a universal daily habit; newspaper advertising therefore reaches each day virtually all who buy.
2. Newspaper advertising is the life blood of local trade because it touches all consumer sources in every community. It gives the national advertiser the same opportunity for complete consumer appeal in any locality.
3. Newspaper advertising cuts selling costs because it entails no waste in locality of circulation. Manufacturers use it to cover markets where it is profitable to do business.
4. Newspaper advertising insures quick, thorough and economical dealer distribution and dealer good will, because retailers are willing to sell products advertised direct to their own customers.
5. Newspaper advertising enables manufacturers to tell where their products may be bought.
6. Newspaper advertising can be started or stopped overnight, can be prepared between days to meet sudden developments and to obtain immediate results.
7. Newspaper advertising enables manufacturers to check advertising results and costs in every market which they enter.
8. Newspaper advertising costs less than any other kind.

"In addition to all the inherent advantages of newspapers," Mr. Hawkins stated, "it is interesting to know that magazines are about 138 per cent in excess cost of newspapers, figuring on the cost per million circulation.

"The newspaper, above all, reaches people, not just the 'market.' The advertiser in a magazine of several hundred thousand circulation reaches that many people, but over an area of 2,000 or 3,000 miles for the most part.

"A newspaper of the same amount of circulation, on the other hand, reaches the people in the advertising merchant's home area, and so the 'punch' of his material is concentrated on the vital spot."

BANKER PRAISES ADVERTISING

Traylor of Chicago Calls It Educational and an Economic Force

Melvin A. Traylor, president of the First National Bank, Chicago, speaking last week before the Advertising Council of the Chicago Association of Commerce, described modern advertising as "a system of education, as well as the greatest single force in distribution."

He enumerated the achievements throughout the world during the quarter century just closed which eclipsed any other similar period in the world's history. Modern advertising and scientific truthful publicity itself he named as one of these achievements, but more important still he emphasized its place in the development of all other achievements.

Mr. Traylor further stated that banks today in dealing with clients and making loans take cognizance of the type of advertising done by a company or firm in promoting sales.

"Truth in news columns and in advertising," continued Mr. Traylor, "is today one of the foundations of American prosperity."

Here is Chrysler with its new Imperial 80, a larger car. And it was a good car plus newspaper advertising that made the original Chrysler such a phenominal success. Having something else to talk about will mean additional space, as for example last Sunday many papers carried not only a big advertisement on the 80, but on Saturday they got wire announcements of equally large size carrying prices.

John N. Willys has not only a new car on the Willys Knight chassis, but he has acquired control of the Stearns Knight. Everyone knows Mr. Willys is a believer in advertising. So he has notified the Stearns Knight dealers that they will not be disturbed and he will not offer the franchise to Overland-Willys Knight distributors. Therefore, he will put a punch into Stearns Knight, undoubtedly, and let the people know something about what was once among the most widely known of our cars. To do that means additional linage. Add the new copy on the latest Willys Knight to what is generally put out on the Overland and it is easy to see the possibilities.

Studebaker plans to average about 24 pages this year in the bigger papers, slipping them two pages a month. From time to time this schedule will be augmented by additional copy as something timely crops up. As Studebaker is having remarkable prosperity there will be several times when it has something worth while to give in a message to the public through the papers.

Reo has worked out a schedule of 26 pages for this year, on a plan of using one big paper in the pivotal centers. To this will be added the linage of the local Reo distributors that generally ties up 800, 1,000 and 1,200 lines of space. This is a more comprehensive campaign than the company has ever planned.

Gardner is getting set for copy in some 50 or more large places on a basis of running a total of 15,000 to 20,000 lines in each section. This will be in addition to what is being used in the National show editions and the magazines.

Hudson-Essex had a whirlwind of a sale in 1925. It was backed up by one of the largest campaigns in the industry. Having had a phenominal year with great possibilities ahead there will be no let up this year.

The amalgamation of the Chandler-Cleveland will bring about greater coordination and cut down overhead. Chandler has had such wonderful success with its new sedan that it really had to curtail its fall advertising campaign and drop some of its full pages. Instead these pages are to be used this year and with them a lot of more copy. Cleveland will be taken care of also as the cars have been selling well.

Paige-Detroit has mapped out a big schedule that will run through until June comprising something like 50,000 for the larger papers on its list. It got its start in December and is now going through on regular slices of 1,000 lines or more. With the New-Day Jewett and a new Paige-Detroit it will have continuous messages about each.

Hupmobile, always a consistent advertiser, spent a lot more money last year. It got the results aimed at. With a new six and a larger eight to talk about Hupmobile copy will make a large hole in any newspaper reading page this year.

Pierce Arrow had a most successful year with its smaller model not only fitting in, but aiding in sales of the larger car. Also its bus business has been increasing faster than anticipated, so with its trucks added its financial year loomed up as the best in years. And its advertising appropriation was increased. It will be larger in 1926.

Franklin was another of the makers bringing out something new that created a furore when the newspapers gave the story. Utilizing the power of the press Franklin sales were overwhelmingly larger in 1925 than in the preceding year. And so it will have more money to spend now.

Ned Jordan has achieved a reputation for saying things in his copy that causes readers to watch for it. And he does not disappoint them by waiting too long between statements. Last year he appeared regularly, and plans to cut down the elapsed time between announcements in 1926. And his copy should be anywhere from 800 or 1,000 lines upward.

Packard was kept so busy turning out cars and counting the money rolling in that everyone was working to the limit. And its advertising was kept before the public because of its policy to keep in the limelight as much as possible.

Dodge Brothers were not negligent in using newspaper space last year, and with a new $10,000,000 expansion program one watches for increased copy. It has grown larger already this year.

Auburn now has a complete line of four, sixes and eights and last year during the closing six months it whooped things up here and there where it needed it with excellent results. Its figures in some places were larger than for two or three previous years. It plans to do more.

Diana came into the limelight last summer out of St. Louis and, as a newcomer craving a welcome, it was prefaced by large pieces of copy. And as it went along it was accompanied by more. When to this is added the Moon total, the two coming from the same plant, although through different companies, it put that city on the map very much. It will be a similar story in 1926.

Peerless brought out a new six this year, too. It has been under new management for several months and the new regime has passed the word out to distributors and dealers that to get results they need to advertise in the newspapers. So the linage has shown a steady increase that will keep up.

Ford has gone along the even tenor of his way telling the story of his product—Fords and Lincolns—to a larger number than ever through the papers until he is now well up with the leaders. He found it paid. And he intends to continue paying the papers large sums.

Rickenbacker copy will be more consistent this year than ever, with larger linage. Stutz is featuring a new eight that will bring into the papers additional revenue. Marmon is running on a campaign now that is to continue into the spring. Velie has worked out a preliminary schedule for its distributors and dealers, embracing copy averaging about 1,000 lines to run twice a month until the beginning of summer or later. Wills Sainte Claire made a very substantial gain last year and its linage increased with such good results that the 1926 total will be larger.

William C. Durant paid more attention to his motor interests last year and now he has them rolling better. Having added a six to the Star line and at a remarkably low price, and the Junior Eight from the Locomobile plant coming along admirably, with Flint always selling and Durant doing fairly well he decided to keep the Star in the limelight more, and say something about the Junior Eight. This policy will be continued.

Kissel has been rolling up a fine total this year for its sales and its advertising has been larger. The volume for 1926 will be increased. Case plans more newspaper copy than in 1925 and Davis is working on new schedules for this year.

When to this is added the tire schedules such as Goodrich running its full pages now, and Goodyear, Firestone, Miller, General, United States joining in in their usual generous way, while Dunlop is making up its mind to try newspapers again that will add more thousands of lines and dollars to the papers. Then there is White truck with such copy as the seven column one this week, and more to come. And the accessories like Champion and A. C. spark plugs, Stewart Warner products, Mobo soaps, Exide and Willard batteries to help out. The big soap men are neglecting a good opportunity in not going after winter business with their glycerine preparations to prevent freezing. The Boyce & Veeder Company is pushing its anti-freeze now where it is getting distribution with much success.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

AS Franklin's birthday is so near date of publication of this issue I want to all attention to the latest book about B. Franklin. "The Religion of Benjamin Franklin" (D. Appleton Company) by ames Madison Stifler corrects many mis-pprehensions about this great colonial rinter and publisher. It sheds new light n a side of Franklin's character that has een under a cloud because of "that great Erratum"—to quote the philosopher's wn words.

Franklin once attended a Presbyterian hurch in Philadelphia where the sermon vas from the text, "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, honest, just, ure, lovely or of good report, if there be ny virtue or any praise think on these hings." Franklin thought the sermon vas mighty poor when he considered the xcellent things suggested by the text. While he got little from the sermon, he hought the text an excellent one for a ewspaper man with the word "think" hanged to "print."

Franklin appears at his best in the let-ers to his favorite sister whom he calls 'Dearest Sister Jenny" and who was the vife of Benjamin Mecom. Franklin was lways helping this husband of his favor-te sister to get established in the news-aper business, as any good history of ournalism will show.

The volume is in error on a few his-orical matters, due doubtless to mis-akes which have been reprinted in en-yclopaedias. For example, on page 90 he assertion is made that the Pennsyl-ania Gazette was established by Ben-amin Franklin while that honor belongs o Samuel Keimer, fellow printer in Philadelphia. Franklin purchased the Gazette with issue number 40. But such lips do not detract from the main pur-ose of the volume which is to show the eligious beliefs held by B. Franklin, Printer.

A brief preface is contributed by Harry Emerson Fosdick. "The Religion of Benjamin Franklin" makes good Sabbath eading for newspaper men. Preachers, owever, can profit most by the book be-ause of the frank criticism of the pulpit y a practical printer.

A NEWSPAPER anthology of distinc-tion is "Klassischer Journalismus" (Rudolph Kaemmerer Verlag, Berlin) ollected and edited by Egon Erwin Kisch. Mr. Kisch has used the term "Klassischer" ecause in his volume he reviews the work f no journalist who is still alive. Mod-rn masterpieces from the newspapers are cheduled for a later volume under the itle, "Zeitgenossische Publizistik."

"Classical Journalism," to use a handy ranslation of the German title, opens with n introduction which, after outlining the lifficulties of preparing an anthology of his type, lists the value of such a volume or present day journalists. The lessons hat may be learned from this anthology re then given. From point of time the olume extends from Pliny, 79 A. D. to Peter Altenberg, 1907.

The material is organized under vari-ous heads. Items in each group are arranged chronologically and each selection is preceded by a summary of the work and life of its author. A wonderful catholicity of taste is shown in the volume.

The first section is headed "Leitartikel" (Editorials). Selections are given from German, French, English, Italian, American, Norwegian and Russian editorial writers. The points of view will doubtless attract the most attention from readers.

Other sections deal with personal experiences sent in by correspondents; news articles and reports from foreign correspondents; court reports, which include the famous one by Zola, "J'accuse"; a miscellaneous group chiefly humorous and satirical and including the work of Defoe, Steele, and Mercier; dramatic criticism; musical criticism; art criticism, and literature.

American newspapers and periodicals are represented—by German translations, of course. The American who received the most attention is Henry M. Stanley for the work which he did as a reporter on the New York Herald. Henry Stephen de Blowitz, called the "king reporter," is represented not with something he contributed from Paris to the London Times but with an article which he published in Harper's Monthly in 1900 about his work.

This comment about "Klassischer Journalismus" ought not to be concluded without an expression on my part of indebtedness to Charlotte H. Pekary of the German Department of Washington Square College, New York University, for translations furnished. The volume ought to be made available in English.

MEMBERS of the working press as well as teachers of journalism will be amused if not instructed with the article "The Newspaper and Literature" which Lawrence F. Abbott contributes to The Outlook for Jan. 13. On one point Mr. Abbott is in error. He says that Charles A. Dana died nearly 30 years ago —"before such a thing as a School of Journalism was thought of." Inasmuch as New York University was the Alma Mater of his father it is a little surprising that he is not familiar with the fact that Whitelaw Reid in the early 70's delivered a lecture at that institution on a "School of Journalism" in which a curriculum was outlined somewhat similar to that found in many of these schools about which is is so skeptical.

The second of a series of articles under the general head, "The American Press," appears in The Outlook for Jan. 13, from the pen of Don C. Seitz. This article takes up "Newspaper Dynasties and Great Chieftains of Journalism." Readers of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER will find little that is new in this article. But readers of The Outlook will doubtlessly be entertained with some of the anecdotes that are retold. For The Outlook for Jan. 20 Mr. Seitz is scheduled for "The Tabloid Press"—"the latest and lowest thing in American journalism."

The Northfield (Minn.) News published on the first of the year a 50th anniversary number. A special section contains interesting recollections of former editors and a historical sketch by Carl L. Weight, city editor of the News. The anniversary edition is dedicated to Joel Prescott Heatwole, for 26 years publisher of the Northfield News.

ARTICLES about the late Frank A. Munsey in various periodicals are too numerous to mention. The one in The New Yorker for Jan. 2, has possibly stirred up the most comment. The one in The Nation reprints the epitaph which appeared in the Emporia (Kan.) Gazette and then adds to the bitter lines of the epitaph the letter of comment printed in the New York World and signed "Newspaper Writer."

In conclusion it adds its own views about Mr. Munsey. To The Nation Mr. Munsey's life seems more an object of pity than of reproach. For some reason The Nation did not notice the reply to the letter of "Newspaper Writer" which Joseph Van Raalte printed in the New York Morning Telegraph. Possibly the Nation may yet comment on the views expressed by Mr. Van Raalte.

After reading all the conflicting opinions expressed in print about Mr. Munsey I am inclined to believe that the editorial in the EDITOR & PUBLISHER comes the closest to a fair appraisal of his life and work.

THE January issue of the American Mercury opens its columns to "Hearst Comes to Atlanta" from the pen of Herbert Asbury. In this article Mr. Asbury gives his views of how the Georgian has been run since it was purchased by William Randolph Hearst in February, 1912. In addition to being extremely critical of Hearst's methods the article is not very complimentary to the Georgian legislature. The article itself when submitted to a qualitative and quantitative analysis somehow does not stand these tests very well.

BUSINESS TICKLERS

THE annual Spring moving season is not far away. Begin lining up the transfer and trucking companies for a double truck advertisement appealing to the thoughts of the prospective mover. —B. A. T.

A novel "Automobile Contest" was conducted by a western newspaper with awards totaling $100. Ten automobile distributors contributed toward the space which used an entire page. The idea was to send in to any of the dealers listed, the name or names of prospective purchasers of automobiles. If the automobile is sold to the prospect, the person turning in the name receives $10. A grand prize of $100, divided into three parts, 1st, 2nd and 3rd prizes, was given to the three contestants turning in the largest number of live prospects by a specified date. The contest was open for a month.—George C. Marcley.

A live poultry page, run a number of weeks in early spring or late winter, should prove a profitable venture. The poultry industry is a huge business now and has many profitable angles and if treated from the "baby chick" angle at this season of the year should bring a wealth of advertisers to the poultry page. For instance a series of articles on poultry run each week, given a local slant, should attract seed, feed and hardware stores, which handle incubators, brooders, feeds, coops, fountains, grit, feeders, etc. Almost every community boasts of hatcheries producing from a few hundred up into the thousands of baby chicks weekly and they should easily be induced to advertise.—Frank G. Davis, Harrisonburg, Pa.

On the lightest advertising day of the week, it has been found profitable to run a "Weekly Business Review" page. Place this heading at the top center and at the sides at the top can be placed the days of the week and the time the business clubs of the city hold their meetings. In the outside columns of the page are placed small advertisements of many diversified small retailers, such as small clothes shops, printers, realtors, dry cleaners, and other concerns that find large space too expensive for them. In the center columns, if there is space left the Milwaukee (Wis.) Sentinel finds it profitable to run two or three stories of some article that is found at one of these shops, or a story of one of the advertisers, or some new invention.—Wilbur Polson.

Possibly you are overlooking a bet if you don't go after the silver, gold and nickel platers in your city for regular advertisements. The platers can often save the householder money by replating articles that otherwise would have to be thrown away. Put to the platers in the right light, the idea should have easy sale.—B. A. T.

We operate a first class job printing department in connection with our newspaper, and combine advertising soliciting with job printing soliciting. A good many times, we get orders for job printing, especially during dull seasons, when a merchant does not want to advertise. We have found this the most effective form of soliciting printing.—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

HUNCHES

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

"NEW YORK'S STATUES—What Are They Thinking About?" is a cash prize contest announced by the New York American, which stirs readers' imaginations and offers a chance for constructive, humorous or philosophical essays.—A. R. C.

A series of articles on "Celebrities I Have Met" and contributed by the readers, both young and old, attracted wide attention and proved a circulation booster for a small country daily. Contributors were limited to 200 words and the recollections sent in ranged from boyhood meetings with some of the presidents who served before the Civil War down through the years to stories of "Black Jack" Pershing and other outstanding figures of the late world struggle.—E. R. Lowe, Waltham, Mass.

Why do people keep gold fish? Bird store proprietors can give some interesting sidelights on the great variety of reasons for this habit. It should make a good local feature.—A. N.

Electric and gas meters, measuring kilowatts and cubic feet, mean nothing to the average householder. This very fact gives opportunity to print an article which will tell just how much it costs to run a washing machine an hour, how much the operation of an iron costs every 60 minutes, what the cost of cooking a roast for two hours is. This information can be obtained easily at the office of the local gas and electric company.—A. C. Regli.

The Cincinnati-Times-Star has been complimented for its heading, "Does Your Club Meet Tomorrow?" over the list of club meetings to be held in the city. It serves as more of a reminder than the usual club column.—Thora Eigenmann.

From its files one of the leading Canadian papers compiles each day the most outstanding events in the realm of sports twenty years ago. These it uses under the caption, "Twenty Years Ago in Sport," providing a daily feature for the sporting page, and allowing the old-timers in sport to check up on their recollections.—C. M. L.

Since no person ever lived who didn't believe he or she could "write for the papers," I believe a good Sunday feature would be to devote a page to news features written up by non-professionals. Let each contestant select whatever interesting feature he desires to write about, limiting each contribution to half a column or less and give a prize for the best written article.—Aubrey Betts.

The Worcester (Mass.) Telegram is running an illustrated daily series of sketches headed "Brightening The Corner," under which outlines of the work of the city's charitable organizations are given, one association being described each day. A two-column box head with pictures of active leaders adds to the effect.—R. B. S.

Develop New Business In

New York State

Advertise in the Daily Newspapers

By intelligent survey of marketing and transportation facilities in New York State, the manufacturer can plan the distribution of his merchandise with a minimum of risk.

You are spared the enormous cost, in money and time, as well as a great volume of detail work necessary to properly survey the territory, by the assurance of cooperation of the New York daily newspapers.

Note that the newspapers listed below completely cover the Empire State. Each paper is prepared to supply you with information that is important and necessary concerning the trading area covered by its circulation, the quality of its circulation and the purchasing power of its readers.

Assuming that your merchandise is properly distributed and that the dealers have your goods on their shelves, the final and most important part of the campaign is to create a demand for your product. There is no better way to create consumer demand than by advertising in the daily newspapers.

Two Important Events in Radio Broadcasting

No. 1—WMAQ Doubles Its Power

WMAQ, radio station of The Chicago Daily News—the only station owned and operated by a Chicago newspaper—is now equipped with a new high-power transmitter with a normal rating of 1,000 watts. The set was manufactured especially for The Chicago Daily News and is regarded by many radio authorities as without a superior for broadcasting.

WMAQ began broadcasting April 13, 1922, when there was but one other station in Chicago. Through the excellence of its radio pages and the high quality of its broadcast programs The Daily News immediately attained a position of leadership in Chicago in radio. The first equipment was soon replaced with the finest broadcasting apparatus that could be bought. The present installation, which is the third purchased by The Chicago Daily News within four years, embodies the latest developments of broadcasting science and still further emphasizes the enterprising leadership of The Chicago Daily News in serving the radio public.

No. 2—Broadcasting the Chicago Symphony Orchestra

The inaugural program of WMAQ's new equipment, December 10, 1925, featured the Chicago Symphony Orchestra which had never before been heard by radio. Nine microphones were used. Only equipment of the highest efficiency could broadcast this program in a manner satisfactory to listeners and to the management of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The tremendous success of this innovation and the superior qualities of the new sending apparatus are evidenced by congratulatory letters and messages received by The Chicago Daily News from all parts of the country. This program is but one of the many presented by the Chicago Daily News in support of its contention that the public needs only to hear good music to appreciate it.

These developments, marking the rapid progress of public radio service in Chicago, are of great interest to Chicago radio fans and even greater significance to radio manufacturers and dealers who sell to the fans. The great majority of radio enthusiasts in Chicago and vicinity read The Daily News and they buy radio equipment through its advertising columns.

American Society of Newspaper Editors Analyzes Day's News Processes

Discuss Organization of Editorial Room, Costs, Crime News—No Decision on Oil Inquiry—Directors Lack Quorum—Small Attendance

By ARTHUR T. ROBB, Jr.

TECHNICAL aspects of journalism engaged the 50 members of the American Society of Newspaper Editors in their annual meeting at Washington last week to a greater extent than at any of the three previous gatherings. The discussions which provoked the most generous and enthusiastic response were those concerning the organization of the editorial room, of the state and city staffs, costs, and to a lesser extent, the threadbare topic of crime news.

Action upon charges preferred against a member of the Society in connection with his activities in the Wyoming oil transactions and investigations in 1924 had been expected at the meeting. It had been announced that the Board of Directors after considering the charges, brought at the 1924 meeting and after hearing the accused member, had agreed upon the final draft of their decision. This draft was to have been considered by a meeting of the board last week in Washington, but such action was prevented by absence of a quorum of the directors. Six of the twelve were present. Three whose presence had been expected were detained at home by illness or office emergencies. The constitution requires seven directors as a quorum. No hint was divulged as to the nature of the decision.

President Casper S. Yost in announcing this condition stated that the board would probably meet during the next month to include all business before it and to elect officers for the coming year. Neither President Yost nor Secretary E. C. Hopwood is a candidate for re-election. Both have won high commendation from their colleagues for their labors during the last four years.

All four directors whose terms expired at the meeting were re-elected. These were besides Messrs. Yost and Hopwood, E. S. Beck, Chicago Tribune, and Arthur M. Howe, Brooklyn Eagle.

A proposed amendment to the section of the constitution under which the board is authorized to proceed against members charged with unprofessional conduct never reached a vote. It was swamped under a mass of words—proposed amendments to the amendment, and various clarifications, definitions, etc., that were offered from the floor. Secretary Hopwood in proposing the amendment stated that the form had been adopted by the directors after the present section had been criticised by lawyers as loosely drawn and not properly integrated. The present section authorizes the board to sit as a court to examine and act upon charges of unprofessional conduct or wilful violations of the rules and regulations of the Society and to censure, expel or suspend a member who has disgraced himself and whose further connection with the Society may injuriously affect its good name and dignity.

The amendment provided that the board shall hear all charges of wilful violation of the constitution, rules and by-laws of the Society.

Mr. Hopwood pointed out that no definition existed for unprofessional conduct, except as set forth in the Canons of Journalism adopted by the Society in 1903 and that there was some question as to the status of the Canons of Journalism as "rules of the Society." There are no by-laws.

Edward S. Beck, managing editor Chicago Tribune and treasurer of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Casper S. Yost, of St. Louis Globe Democrat, president of the Society, and C. M. Morrison, Philadelphia Public Ledger, chairman of Program Committee, attending annual meeting.

It was upon this point that the long discussion focussed. Some members wished to adopt by formal resolution the Canons as rules of the organization. Others opposed this on the ground that ethics cannot be enacted into legislation, that ethics are guide posts on the path of conduct and that a number of the Canons would have to be redrafted if they were to be adopted as rules. That, it was pointed out, was a matter for months of deliberation. A proposed amendment to the amendment would have incorporated the words "Canons of Journalism" into the new section.

When asked from the floor as to the effect of the amendment upon proceedings now before the board, President Yost expressed the opinion that it might not be to the best interests of the Society, and advised against passage of the amendment at the meeting. The discussion continued until ended summarily by a motion to adjourn for luncheon, moved by Walter M. Harrison of the Oklahoma City Oklahoman. It was not resumed.

Mr. Harrison at a later session won the Society's approval of his motion that the Society send President Yost as its representative at the third session of the Press Congress of the World in Geneva next September. The editors evinced keen interest in the announcement of the Press Congress meeting by Fred M. Snyder, representative of that organization.

No vote was taken on the suggestion that the Society alter its custom of meeting in Washington, which appears to remain as the favored centre for the annual assembly. Prof. Roscoe C. E. Brown of the School of Journalism, Columbia University, tendered an invitation to the editors to meet on the Columbia campus in New York next year, outlining the many advantages that the school affords for such a meeting and adding that Adolph S. Ochs had promised to entertain the Society at a dinner in the Times office if the New York invitation received approval. Arthur M. Howe, chairman of the Society's committee on journalism schools, endorsed Prof. Brown's invitation, and the thanks of the Society were expressed in a resolution moved by E. S. Beck. Tom Wallace of the Louisville Courier-Journal warned the editors that a policy of changing the meeting-place from year to year would put the Society in the position of auctioning its meetings to the highest bidder, with the probable result that local entertainment would consume most of the meeting period. The directors will name the next meeting place without advice from the membership.

William Allen White, editor of the Emporia Gazette, scheduled as the star speaker at the annual banquet, was kept at home by Mrs. White's illness. Kent Cooper, general manager of the Associated Press, and John H. Finley of the New York Times editorial staff, made addresses pertinent to the large gathering of editors and members of the Cabinet, the Senate, and the House which filled the Willard ballroom. The remarks of both are printed substantially in full elsewhere in this issue. Alexander P. Moore, who went almost directly from the editorship of the old Pittsburgh Leader to Madrid as American Ambassador, told stories of the King of Spain and illustrating a newspaper man's aptitude for diplomacy. He contrasted the prosperity of the artisan in America with the poverty of the Spanish nobility and exhorted the editors not to "rock the boat," or to say or do anything that might upset the present well-being of this country. The former Ambassador's address was not reported by the stenographer, by his own request.

Among the guests at the head table were: Frank B. Noyes, publisher of the Washington Star and president of the Associated Press; President George Barton Cutten of Colgate University; Secretary of War Dwight F. Davis; Bishop Freeman of Washington; Elbert H. Baker, publisher of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and the speakers.

President Yost, whose report appears in full on another page, stressed the difficulty of arriving at definitions of journalistic conduct which could satisfy all of the many kinds of newspaper men represented in and out of the society and declared that the enforcement of a code of ethics, applicable only to institutions, by an organization having but a limited degree of control over these institutions, was impracticable. Enforcement should be a matter of example, rather than force.

Secretary Hopwood implied similar views in his report which commented slightly upon the idea expressed by some members that the Society should take a more positive stand upon matters affecting journalism. Mr. Hopwood's report, a remarkable document of its kind in its breadth and treatment of subject matter, is also given in substance elsewhere. It indicates a membership of 174, an increase of 21 names being characterized by the secretary as comfortable, though not entirely satisfactory.

Treasurer Beck reported an increase of $551 in the treasury balance, which at the close of last year totalled $3,264.13. The membership now represents 31 States, the District of Columbia and Hawaii, Mr. Beck reported.

The Committee on Ethical Standards, whose report in 1924 started the Society on its oil investigation, made no report this year, its work having been closely associated with that of the board of directors.

Chairman Howe of the committee on journalism schools, reported on the recent meeting in New York of the teachers of journalism and expressed approval of instruction in the technical as well as the theoretical and academic aspects of journalism. Mr. Howe's committee has been limited in activity due to the chairman's illness during the past year.

Paul Bellamy, managing editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, whose good-humored and comprehensive reports on his committee's efforts to guard the integrity of the press have become one of the meeting's drawing cards, related characteristically his committee's reaction to an anonymous article printed in Harper's Magazine last summer. Neither Mr. Bellamy nor his colleague on the Plain Dealer, Secretary Hopwood, approve the purpose for which the committee was created several years ago and they moved its abolition. The Society defeated the motion.

Marvin Creager, managing editor of the Milwaukee Journal, again reported for the committee on syndicates to the effect that editors who complained against the syndicates usually had only to blame their own lack of confidence in themselves and their newspapers and their lack of skill in buying. Mr. Creager found little basis in fact for the circulation-building claims of features, declared that he would be extremely jealous of any feature which might be regarded as vitally necessary to his newspaper's success, and would in fact be glad to have such a feature taken away from him. He blamed the editors also for making "big names" by news play, later paying high prices to syndicates for the use of the names they had created.

The syndicate viewpoint was presented in non-controversial fashion by David Lawrence, president of the recently formed association of syndicates, an idea which, Mr. Lawrence declared, had its genesis in the success of the editors' society.

Open forum discussions were introduced to the Society's proceedings Friday afternoon, when Harvey Ingham, editor of the Des Moines Register Tribune told about that newspaper's experiment in segregating crime news on an inside page. Mr. Ingham's thesis was that the front page is not the place where the important news of a newspaper appears, but the place reserved for the unexpected. The important news pages are frequently the sports and the market pages, he declared, and much of the crime which is given page one display is routine and no more unexpected in character than the market reports or the story of the daily baseball game.

Edmund W. Booth, editor of the Grand Rapids Press, drew a distinction between crime and scandal and expressed the belief that most of the criticism of newspapers was directed against the latter rather than against reporting crime. He cited the Rhinelander case in New York as an example of scandal news with no criminal aspects.

The printing of crime news was ably defended by several editors as the newspaper's duty to the public. Grove Patterson, editor of the Toledo Blade, quoted a British police officer as urging the American newspapers to co-operate with the police and to print more crime news, rather than less, as the British press does, pointing out that London with three times the population of a certain American city which went unnamed, had less than 8 per cent. of its number of murders in a single year.

SECRETARY HOPWOOD'S REPORT

THE board has held three meetings since the society last assembled in annual session. The first was the organization meeting held immediately after the annual dinner last year, at which time the board organized by the election of the following officers for the year:

Casper S. Yost, President.
George E. Miller, First Vice-President
Edgar B. Piper, Second Vice-President
E. S. Beck, Treasurer.
E. C. Hopwood, Secretary.

The second meeting was the regular mid-year session of the board which was held at Chicago Oct. 13. Routine business was disposed of, arrangements made for the time and place of the annual meeting and eligible candidates elected to membership. The board authorized the secretary to undertake the publication of a bulletin for the membership.

The greater part of the October session was given over to a consideration of charges growing out of the Senate's report on the Wyoming oil leases, in which the members will recall that references were made to several newspaper men.

The third meeting of the board was held Thursday, Jan. 14, 1926, at which time the final draft of the committee's decision on the Senate charges was agreed upon.

The following have been admitted to membership since the last annual meeting:

At the meeting of the board Jan. 17, 1925: W. O. Jones, Lincoln (Neb.) State Journal; Curtis A. Hodges, Indianapolis News; Oscar S. Foellinger, Fort Wayne News-Sentinel; Geo. F. Milton, Chattanooga News; Fred Fuller Shedd, Philadelphia Bulletin; Walter Lippmann, New York World and Newbold Noyes, Washington Star.

At the meeting of the board in Chicago, Oct. 13: C. B. Gillespie, Houston Chronicle.

By mail vote: William Preston Beazell, New York World; Raymond C. Coll, Honolulu Advertiser; Col. W. S. Copeland, Newport News Press; Ralph Ellis, Kansas City Journal-Post; Junius P. Fishburn, Roanoke World-News; Earle E. Martin, Cleveland Press; Robert McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin; E. J. Stackpole, Harrisburg Telegraph and J. H. Tennant, New York Evening World.

The membership has shown a comfortable, though not an entirely satisfactory increase in the past year. The membership of the society since its organization is as follows: 1922, 93; 1923, 119; 1924, 127; 1925, 153; 1926, 174. While this is a satisfactory increase, particularly since the board believes that membership in the society is a thing to be sought rather than peddled, the secretary is convinced that in almost every city within the society's population limits there are several men whose presence in the society and in its meetings would contribute very materially to its influence and service. Failure to interest these men in the society cannot be attributed to lack of effort on the part of the membership committee. The secretary can testify to the zeal and hard work of this committee, irrespective of its personnel, since the organization of the society. Present members of the society ought to undertake a thorough canvass of their cities in order that men who have something to contribute to the society and who can take something from it are not denied its responsibilities and benefits.

The matter of personal contact and closer associations among the membership is one which must be maintained in this organization, if it is to continue to achieve anything approaching its possibilities. To this end the secretary asked the board at Chicago to authorize the publication of a bulletin in which announcements and information having to do with the operation of the society might be conveyed to the members, together with some exchange of ideas about newspaper work. Repeatedly in his correspondence the secretary found expressions of regret from members that their contacts with each other were limited to the one meeting per year, and the bulletin grew out of an attempt to satisfy this want.

The members of the society are already familiar with the bulletin, three issues of which have now appeared. The secretary has no illusions about it whatever. It is at best a beginning, and just what the reactions of the society are to it the secretary has no way of knowing, except through various kind letters of appreciation which have been received from time to time. It is certain that the bulletin will not be an effective publication, it will not satisfy the want felt by many members of the society, unless every member makes it a part of his responsibility to read it, criticize it and to contribute to it.

There are, in the opinion of your sec- tary, some very serious problems wh confront an organization such as t society. From the beginning the ext of the area covered by the society s been a considerable handicap in its ope- tion. Members must in many cases tra long distances at considerable expense attend the annual meetings. With meetings of the board held in Chica the members must still make a real sac fice in order to attend the meetings.

The society can only overcome th handicaps of time and distance by off ing to its members values which v compensate for the sacrifices involv The fact that interest in it has been well maintained is evidence that it is t considerable degree satisfying the n which was felt to exist when the soci was organized. But there are ot possibilities of service which have co to the secretary's attention which is opinion of some, at least, of the me bers would tend to extend the serv of the society to its membership.

Some members have come to questi the policy of holding the meeting Washington each year. While time a place of meeting is something which board is empowered to determine a while the society went on record Atlantic City as favoring Washingt as the annual meeting place, it is pos ble that the time has come when society may wish to reopen the questi

There are also members who feel th would benefit greatly by closer conta with men who head the greater new papers of the nation than they are al to obtain in the general sessions of t annual meeting. The suggestion of rou table sessions has been made in t bulletin and apparently touches a des which is in many minds. Most edito are constantly confronted with proble which others may have solved, and series of limited group meetings formal in their nature, headed by the able to speak with the greatest authori might easily be of very real value those compelled to win through th difficulties unaided.

Again there are some who feel that t society must go on record more positive on matters common to all newspape and perhaps on some of general intere and importance. It is not the functi of the secretary in such a report as t to express an opinion on this, but record such observations as he is ab to make through his necessarily clos contact with the membership. It may pertinent and proper to observe th this contact has only strengthened a co viction that the newspaper is—and pe haps ought to be—a very highly ind vidualistic enterprise, and that edito are as a rule extreme individualist There is no doubt that there are ve many issues both in and out of t newspaper office in which the weight the influence of such a body as this wou be a determining factor. Whether would be either wise or possible for t society to commit itself on many of the is something which future developmen and the evolution of policies in boar of directors who are to come will ha to determine. The fact remains th there are members who ask whether talking organization will not eventuall talk itself out and whether the time not at hand when action will have to g along with words.

The secretary is aware that he ha probably gone beyond the letter of hi constitutional authority in submitting report of this nature. He desires to ad only one thing and that is that the chie burdens and responsibilities of the forma tive years of this organization have bee borne by a small group of men who hav been willing to give it their time an energy for the possibilities of servic which they believed it offered to th profession of which they are proud to b a part. These burdens and responsibili ties must soon pass to other shoulders Your secretary hopes that those wh come after may give of their time, thei labor and themselves as unselfishly an wholeheartedly as have those with whom he has had the pleasure of being associ ated for the last four years—and, sinc the purpose is so highly worth the sacri fice, he has all faith that they will.

YOST SURVEYS ETHICAL PROGRESS OF A. S. N. E.

President of Editors' Group Says Greatest Advance Will Come From Individual Efforts of Members—Suggests Special Committee Be Named to Study Crime News

DIFFICULTIES surrounding enforcement of the ethical code of the American Society of Newspaper Editors were discussed at length by Casper S. Yost, editor of the editorial page of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and president of the society in his annual address opening the annual convention in Washington, Friday, Jan. 15.

Mr. Yost pointed out that no practical means are available for imposing strict obedience to the canons of the society, and suggested that journalism will be improved by individual work of society members. He also suggested offering prizes to journalism students for essays on ethics in relation to newspaper work, and the appointment of a committee by the society to study and recommend methods for the treatment of crime news. Mr. Yost's address follows in full:

"What I am about to say is in the nature of a swan song. During the four years in which it has been my privilege to preside over this society it has been necessary for me to give no little thought to its welfare and to the accomplishment of its purposes. I need not restate these purposes. They are set forth in the preamble to the constitution of the society, and while additional aims will doubtless be suggested by circumstances and opportunity these will remain the basic objects of our organized concern.

"These purposes are being accomplished in the meetings and activities of the society. It has undoubtedly promoted a better acquaintance; it has given us the opportunity, which we had not had before, to interchange ideas as to professional ideals and professional duties; it has promoted the development of a professional spirit in the collective sense; it has done something toward the maintenance of the dignity and rights of the profession, and something more toward the establishment of ethical standards of newspaper practice.

"It is of the last, though it is but one of a number, that I wish particularly to speak. I received not long ago a letter from a member of the society, for whom I have a very high respect, in which he questioned the ethical accomplishments of the society, saying he was unable to find any evidence of its effect upon the ethical conduct of the newspapers edited by its members. Those that are reasonably clean, he said with truth, were so before their editors became members of our society, and those that are not clean have not apparently been affected by our proclamation of journalistic virtue. And he pointed, by way of example, to one newspaper which, he thought, violates every principle that we laid down in our code of ethics. Yet with his regard for the managing editor of that paper that he would be the last person in the world, he said, to prefer a charge against him on account of the attitude of his paper.

"I think I can, without violation of confidence, for I shall mention no names, take this the theme for some discussion. In the first place this was a frank expression of doubt by one who, I believe, is interested in the welfare of the society. I respect the man and his feeling and am glad that he unbosomed himself in that way. But what was to have been expected, and what is to be expected, of this organization in relation to ethical standards of newspaper practice? Was it the belief of any of us that by coming together and giving collective expression to some ethical principles we could work an immediate and visible change in the moral conduct of our newspapers? Was it the belief of any of us that this, or any, organization could so influence or control the acts and the practices of men or of institutions as to alter materially and at once the thoughts, the methods and the habits of that portion of the press which does not conform to the principles enunciated by the society? If any so imagined their disappointment was inevitable.

"It has never been my idea that the society was to be a reformatory organization in any radical sense. I do not believe that the press, speaking generally, is in need of any violent reforms. It would be absurd to say that it is without fault. Nothing conducted by man is free from error, and I know of no profession that is impeccable. No one is more aware of the faults of the press than we who serve in it, and one of the fundamental purposes of this organization is to labor for its betterment. But that involves no admission that its practices are gravely wrong; only that there is room and need for improvement, as there is, and always is, in every profession and every vocation.

"How is improvement to be effected? It was the view of the society that some form should be given to the ideals of the profession in relation to newspaper conduct; that an effort should be made to set forth general principles of sound practice as a statement of the "ought to be" of good journalism. Out of this conviction came the society's "Canons of Journalism." In these canons we have endeavored to erect certain ethical standards, first to give form and substance to a common conviction of right, and second to establish something in the nature of a focal point for the professional consciousness.

"Now what has been the result of that action? It has stimulated thought throughout the profession as nothing else has ever done. There has been more discussion of ethical questions since these canons were adopted than, I venture to say, in the whole previous history of journalism. It has been influential in no small degree in causing journalism generally to turn the searchlight upon itself. Many state and regional press associations have followed the example of this society in formulating codes of ethics. The ethical quality of instruction in the schools of journalism has been strengthened. There has been not only a quickened consciousness of professional responsibilities in the moral sense, but a quickened professional conscience.

"But we have not been content with a statement of our own opinions of what ought to be. We have sought to get an external view of our profession and its conduct through the eyes of observing and thoughtful men and women who are outside of it. At every meeting we have had persons present or have had letters sent in response to invitation, to tell us what they think is wrong with the press, as they see it in daily operation. These criticisms have had some value and will continue to have value, for in any judgment of ourselves it is desirable to see ourselves as others see us.

"I believe this society has been, and is, an influence for the ethical betterment of newspaper conduct, and I believe it will be an increasing influence to that end. But can it be made to work more effectively to that accomplishment? If so, how?

"Let me first outline the difficulties that are in the way. This is not a society of newspapers but of men. And being men we have varied views as to what is right and as to the importance of right. Although we have given expression to certain principles of right in our canons, we do not give the same interpretation to these principles nor do we feel an equal urge to their specific application. For example, my correspondent says the paper to which he refers violates every principle that we laid down in our code of ethics. Yet I am a daily reader of that paper and am unable to see wherein it offends. For another example, I recall that during the campaign of 1924 an editorial writer on a rival paper charged that the paper with which I have the honor to be connected violated our canons of journalism in the publication of a statement by a party committee, which it is my honest conviction was not only perfectly proper and in no sense a violation of the canons but was a legitimate piece of news which it was the duty of the paper to print. Yet I do not believe there is any member of the society more deeply interested in the advancement of journalistic ethics than I am.

"Another difficulty that is in the way of concrete and rapid accomplishment, such as my correspondent apparently expected, is that enforcement of ethical principles is neither feasible nor desirable. It is not feasible for a number of reasons. Our canons apply only to newspapers. They have nothing to do with individual conduct. We are not a society of newspapers, as I have said. We cannot try newspapers. Most of us are not in such complete personal control of the newspapers with which we are associated that we can be held personally responsible for the conduct of our newspapers. Moreover, in every large newspaper there are a number of editorial executives each in charge of a different department. If the conduct of such a newspaper is offensive, and but one of its executives is a member of the society, he cannot be made answerable for newspaper conduct in another department of the paper. We cannot undertake to punish a member of the society for the acts of a newspaper that are not within his personal control. And even in the case of a member whose authority is complete it would be extremely difficult to prove his personal responsibility for any specific offense. Codes of ethics in all professions apply solely to personal conduct in the practice of the profession, and charges can be brought against no one save for specific offenses individually committed. A man in full authority over all departments of a large newspaper can never scrutinize all that goes into his paper and rarely could it be possible to obtain evidence to hold him individually responsible for any specific act of his subordinates. We cannot try newspapers, I repeat, and any offense to come within our jurisdiction must be an individual offense by a member of this society and provable upon a specific charge applied to a specific instance.

"But if newspapers as such were within our jurisdiction whose interpretation of our principles would we endeavor to enforce? My correspondent intimates that but for his friendship for the editor of the paper to which he refers he would bring charges against him. I haven't the slightest idea what he would charge, but in view of the character of that paper I feel certain that upon the same interpretation few of us could escape. I am not criticising his views. I am merely calling attention to the differences of opinion that prevail, and must prevail, as to abstract conceptions of right. There are some among us who insist that we must have a code with teeth in it; but what sort of teeth, how is it to bite and whom is it to bite? I cannot agree with this view. The enforcement of a code of ethics, applicable only to institutions, by an organization having but a limited degree of control over these institutions is, in my opinion, impracticable. And that, let me add, has been my opinion from the beginning, experience and study having but served to strengthen my conviction. The canons themselves recognize this position in their closing statement, which reads: 'Lacking authority to enforce its canons the journalism here represented can but express the hope that deliberate pandering of vicious instincts will encounter effective public disapproval or yield to the influence of a preponderant professional condemnation.'

"Enforcement is not feasible. Neither, as I have said, is it desirable. It is not desirable because in the first place, differences of opinion over causes, means and methods would inevitably split us into warring factions creating disharmony, disunity and disorder, destroying rather than strengthening the influence this society should yield for the betterment of journalism. But it is not desirable for more fundamental reasons. We as a society and as individuals are defenders of the freedom of the press. Collectively and severally we are opposed to any encroachment upon that freedom by measures designed to control or to regulate newspaper conduct. Without exception we condemn censorship in any form. How then can we consistently endeavor to set up a censorship of our own? I am unable to see any valid distinction in principle between censorship of the press by this society and censorship of the press by any other society, political or otherwise. We contend that it is our inalienable right to conduct our newspapers as we see fit, subject only to the laws governing our personal and institutional responsibility. How then can we undertake to set up laws of our own, with punitive powers to enforce them, which would in effect be an effort of certain members of this society to control and regulate the newspaper conduct of other members?

"Another point: This is a matter of ethics, of moral principles, practices and duties. Ethical standards are moral standards. Morality cannot be created by law, and there is no task under government, whether political, religious or social government, so involved in difficulties as the effort to enforce even an outward conformity with a moral enactment applying to individual conduct.

"But notwithstanding all this our canons are not without meaning or without force. I have already indicated the character and trend of their influence. They have that influence because they are expressive of the convictions and the aspirations of that body of this society. Not one of us, not one of our newspapers, perhaps, lives up to them in every particular and constantly, fully exemplifying them each day. But all ethical progress has ever been through the development of public opinion and sentiment in favor of specific standards of moral conduct. It has always been, and will always be, an educational and spiritual progress, moving from an idealistic conception of what ought to be toward a progressive realization of that conception. The standards of right, the conception of what ought to be, are essential to that progress. We have but to keep our standards before us, to endeavor ourselves to conform to them, in accord with our individual interpretation of them, in order to make them ultimately the dominating principles of newspaper conduct.

"But we can do more than that. We can exercise our influence and our example to make them more and more fundamental in the training of the coming generation of journalists. We can by cooperation with the schools of journalism find ways of impressing these principles more deeply upon the students. We can, for example, offer prizes for the best study of ethics in relation to newspaper work. Many of these young people will some day be in control of newspapers, and if the right ideas can be instilled into their minds before they become 'hard-boiled,' as most of us are today, they will work automatically for newspaper betterment.

"Again we can work individually and collectively to arouse the interest and support of newspaper publishers whereever that interest and support is lacking. There are men among us who are personally deeply concerned in these matters but who are in the employ of publishers who care nothing about them and who are indisposed to apply these principles. I think the American Newspaper Publishers Association should be prevailed upon to endorse our canons and to give serious consideration to their application.

"But I am inclined to believe we can make more effective progress by undertaking to create specific rules of practice based upon the principles of our canons. To illustrate what I mean by this let me take the matter of crime news as an example. There is no ethical question before us today as important and as urgent as this. The prevalence of crime in America constitutes a national disgrace. As newspaper men, whose duty it is to deal with public affairs in news and editorial, this is a matter in which we are deeply concerned, and in regard to which we have a definite obligation to exercise our influence for the betterment of these conditions. But it is claimed by many that the newspapers are to some extent responsible for our criminal situation, and they are being urged by many responsible elements of the people to cease the publication of crime news, or to make such news as brief and inconspicuous as possible. In response to this demand some our newspapers have been experimenting along these lines. Now I do not agree with that idea at all. I not only do not believe that the publication of crime news has had, or is having, any material influence in promoting crime, but I believe that the publication of crime news is one of the most important duties of a newspaper as a responsible agency of public information. And I believe further that when news of a criminal occurrence is of a nature to warrant publication on the first page, because of the degree of public interest in it, the first page is where it ought to go.

"But none the less we have a responsibility in this matter and ought to consider the question seriously. That question, as I see it, is not whether we should or should not print crime news, or whether we should or should not bury it in the remote interior, but how we ought to handle it on its merits. Would it not be desirable for the committee on ethical standards, or a special committee, to undertake a study of a proper method of reporting and printing crime news, and present to the society for its consideration some simple rules for the general guidance. It is my thought that if the committee and the society together can work out some specific rules of that character that will commend themselves to the general judgment, an effort might be made to induce each member and each newspaper represented in the society to agree to put the rules into actual operation. By that method of giving concrete and practical form to abstract principles, applied gradually to this and other problems, it seems to me we might effect in no great time a plainly visible betterment of newspaper practices.

"I have here confined myself to the consideration of this one of the purposes of the society, partly because I am deeply concerned in the matter, but mainly because I see in the differences of opinion arising from it the chief danger to the welfare of the society, and I want this organization to grow in power and influence and grace for the continuous accomplishment of good for journalism."

COMMITTEE ON PRESS INTEGRITY FOUND SMALL NEED FOR ACTIVITY

ONLY one attack on the "Integrity of the press" was called to account by the society's committee, its chairman, Paul Bellamy, managing editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer reported. He outlined the year's work as follows:

I might say that there was considerable doubt all year as to whether this Committee had anything but a metaphysical existence. The long and regrettable illness of our President did have something to do with it. I was told that I should continue as the Chairman, and then no other members of the committee were appointed.

However, I did a few things and submit this skeleton of a report because I think that the work which was charged to that committee either ought to be dropped or it ought to be organized on a different basis.

It appears to your committee on integrity of the press that during the past year there has been somewhat less smping at the newspapers of the United States than during the year before.

There have been two examples of what we believe to be unfair attacks on the newspaper profession which, because of their source or their distribution, are worth mention here.

Last June Harper's Magazine published an article entitled "Sell the Papers," author anonymous, the thesis of which ar ticle was that newspapers had left all ethics behind and were clattering down the primrose path having subordinated everything to circulation.

On July 17, 1925, the chairman of your committee wrote Harper's as follows:

"The committee on Integrity of the Press of the American Society of Newspaper Editors registers herewith an emphatic protest against the unfair, ungentlemanly and prejudicial article published in Harper's magazine for June under the title, 'Sell the Papers.'

"At the present time there is a movement under way in several cities, including Cleveland and Washington, aimed at the suppression of indecent magazines by the police authority.

"Would Harper's consider this a proper justification for a daily newspaper to launch a violent assault against monthly periodicals, under the title 'Sell the Magazines', lumping them all for intents and purposes into one evil group, and making little if any effort to distinguish, let us say, the Century Magazine from the most prurient publication in the imitation French style?

"Yet this, in the case of the daily journals, is substantially what the anonymous author of 'Sell the Papers' has done.

"A man would be a fool or liar who should contend that either newspaper or periodical could long endure without some regard for public taste, some effort to publish the kind of material its readers liked. Your anonymous author appears to have been permanently embittered by discovering that daily newspaper readers did not care for the subjects which interested him, a fact from which it appears the proper conclusion might be that the public taste is fundamentally sound after all.

"The committee on Integrity of the Press resents and repudiates in toto the general impression intended by Mr. X., the author of 'Sell the Papers', viz., that the newspapers of America by and large have betrayed their trust, capitulated to commercialism, and hoisted the Jolly Roger to the masthead.

"If Harper's wants to reform journalism, we recommend more candor, more discrimination and more facts.

"The committee does not believe it in the Harper tradition to let this matter lie where it is and suffer what we hold to be a distorted picture of American journalism to remain in the public mind.

Very truly yours,

"Chairman,
"Committee on Integrity of the Press
"American Society of Newspaper Editors"

Under date of July 23, Thomas B. Wells, editor of Harper's Magazine, replied as follows:

"Mr. H. J. Fisher has just handed me your letter of July 17th addressed to him as president of this Company.

"I greatly regret that you and your colleagues feel that the article published in the July number of Harper's Magazine and entitled 'Sell the Papers!', was unfair and prejudiced. I have already exchanged letters with Mr. Hopwood on this matter and I am most hopeful he will write something for us in the autumn which will present the other side of the case. You will readily appreciate that in a monthly magazine that makes up eight weeks ahead of publication it is very difficult to print a reply to an article soon enough to be effective. We have no desire to antagonize the newspaper editors of America, who have shown their friendship for u so many instances. At the same time, I you will not resent my saying that a newspaper men this article has aroused commendation that condemnation. How I quite agree with you that generalizati a dangerous thing and it may be that author has, unintentionally erred in that re I am sorry that I am not able to give yo name, for he has an excellent standing i newspaper world and is anything but an bittered man.

"Please express my regret to your orga tion that they feel as they do and my that we may be able to publish in the future articles which will, to their mind, sent a satisfactory picture of American nalism.

"With many thinks for your letter an good wishes."

The other incident constituting an portant attack on the integrity of j nalism is the series of articles in Outlook by Don C. Seitz, late and of the New York World. Two of articles have already been published more are to follow.

The committee has thus far taker action with respect to Mr. Seitz' at but the President of the Society, Yost, has replied to the first Seitz ar in EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Frankly, the committee would like expression of opinion from the mem ship of the society at this meeting, a how it ought to proceed in handlin matter like the Seitz articles.

This is not a case of ignorant critic The articles represent the settled opi of a veteran newspaper man whose perience certainly has been as wide as of any member of this society.

It seems to the committee that to v a letter of protest to Mr. Seitz is a on a par with writing a letter to S Claus. Are we in much better however, if we write to Outlook M zine? The editors of the publica presumably knew what they were d when they permitted Mr. Seitz to a forum for his views in their period

The Harper's case differed from Outlook case in that its author was lowed to hide behind anonymity an make sweeping statements without gi chapter and book.

While leaving open the exact cours be followed by the committee in the S case (the articles being not yet compl the chairman of your committee expre his own belief that the chief value of committee is to be found in dealing cases of unfair criticism by well in tioned, but ill-informed men. Often t these are men in public positions an word from the committee bears fruit.

In other words is not the commi like a city fire department? The les is called out to fires the better for city. Its mere existence constitutes so thing of a deterrent against those start fires.

In its last report the committee pressed the opinion that the two cou lay open to the Society with respec the future of the committee on integ of the press.

1. The Society could continue the c mittee as at present, realizing its lim tions. These limitations are inherent. the first place, the members of the c mittee are far scattered. In the sec place, the membership at large of the ciety, with a few striking exceptions, h failed to report to the committee any c calling for committee action. The c mittee has had to depend upon its reading for the discovery of unfair tacks on the newspaper profession. T of course, has fallen far short of cover the entire field.

2. The society could expand the w into something like that attempted by vigilance committee of the Associated vertising Clubs of the World. T would require a paid secretariat an clipping bureau service. Also it wo cost money.

Finally, the chairman of your commit can not get over a feeling that the o arena in which a newspaper fights eff tively is in its own columns and w hardly an exception no newspaper importance has adopted a policy of a wering in its own columns the slings arrows of outrageous criticism.

In view of this undoubted fact, w does the society expect of the commit on integrity of the press?

HOW SHALL PRESS TREAT CRIME NEWS?

Editors in Debate Relate Experiences and Offer Varying Views of Proper Methods—Overplay Deplored, But Crime Situation Calls for Truth—Scandal Mongering Denounced

FOR more than an hour, on Friday, members of the Society of American Newspaper Editors discussed in open forum the question of crime news. Opinions differed as widely as might have been expected. Overplay was generally deplored, although one editor expressed the view that not enough crime news was printed. Following is a section of the debate:

Harvey Ingham, Des Moines Register-Tribune: I think every person who comes into our office has something he desires to have published on the front page. The important news of our newspaper, of course, does not appear on the first page. Many subscribers want the market page, for instance. The front page is reserved for unanticipated news. If Mr. Hard should discover the President is growing a beard, the news would gravitate to the front page.

Our editors have made the mistake of looking upon all crime news as the unexpected, whereas the general run of crime is constant. We have wearied our readers by putting crime in the most conspicuous place. We should segregate crime news exactly as we do other news.

If the President of the United States should be shot, I believe the Christian Science Monitor would have it on the front page. I mean no disrespect to the Monitor; I read it every day and it is one of the finest publications in the United States. Crime news should be treated precisely as other news and only such crime news should appear on the front page as belongs properly with that unexpected news that occupies the front page.

Of course we entered into the experiment of segregating crime news as a piece of enterprise and our experience has been we are making far better newspapers judged by newspaper standards by treating crime incidentally, as it should be treated, than we did when we tried to make a sensation of every criminal event.

I believe the newspaper editor would find his readers would appreciate it if that plan were followed generally. I think crime news should appear in small type, not larger than six point, in a segregated portion, where those interested sociologically would look for it. Our own experiment has shown that our readers are much more interested in other large classes of news than they are in the news of crime.

C. H. Dennis, Chicago Daily News: In my state and city, a great deal has been said in recent months about crime. We have had our share, to put it mildly, and the newspapers have been trying to tell what ought to be done about crime.

The Bar Association of our State appointed a committee to investigate the subject of the press in crime, and there was considerable feeling that the press, by publishing so much crime news had, in a measure, been responsible for some crime, having made the potential criminal go out and commit crime.

This committee, of which the chairman was a very able member of our Supreme Court, recently called a meeting in Chicago of various State's attorneys and district attorneys and judges and eminent lawyers and newspaper men to consider the subject, and we had quite a meeting. We spoke fully and frankly, and various district attorneys and lawyers were of the opinion that the press had not only on some occasions caused crimes to be committed, but had interfered with the proper prosecution of crime by publishing the particulars of murders, if you please, so that when a case came in for trial, they would find many eminent citizens saying that they could not serve on the juries because they had read accounts in the newspapers.

That was regarded as a very difficult thing for the press to answer. The press had made these particulars of crime so well known that our good citizens couldn't be jurors, and therefore the jurymen were ignorant people who didn't read the newspapers or didn't make up their minds.

It seemed to me that that was very illogical reasoning, because I think ignorant people make up their minds about as quickly as anybody, and they make up their minds without any particular knowledge of the subject.

It was said by these worthy State's attorneys and district attorneys and judges on the bench that in their view the newspapers ought to get together and form a code of ethics in order to preach that code to one another. When I was called upon, I enlightened them to the extent of telling them there was such an organization as the American Society of Newspaper Editors, that it had framed a code of ethics, and was generally trying to lift the standards of the newspaper profession.

Two members of the Supreme Court of Illinois and other judges of eminence expressed profound astonishment and pleasure.

We were asked by these judges and lawyers whether the bar and press could co-operate, and I, for one, expressed the view that they had best deal with their own subjects and try to elevate their own standards.

I speak of that merely as showing that this Society is helping the press by showing that the press is dealing with its own problems. So it is not lost motion or anything like it. It is not only what we learn but what we show as to our purposes in trying to build up our profession and improve our methods.

James T. Williams, Boston American: With respect to what was said about the segregation of crime news, I didn't find myself wholly in agreement, because it seemed to me that this fact was lost sight of, that whenever a real crime is committed in the community, it is potentially a threat to every home in the community and involves the security of the individual, which is a subject of vital interest to every home-owner dwelling in the community. That being the case, you can't always relegate it to the sports page or to any other page.

While undoubtedly there is room for improvement regarding certain phases of crime news, with respect to co-operation between newspapers and police and accuracy of reporting, we ought not to lose sight of this fundamental fact—there are two schools of thought on the subject. When George Washington bade us be prepared for war as the best protection against war, he was really guilty of committing us to a policy that would encourage war. By the same token, there are those who believe that the publication of the facts about crime puts criminal notions into the minds of our people. There is another school that combats those theories, and I believe that the latter school of thought is represented in large part by the newspapers of the country.

E. W. Booth, Grand Rapids Press: It has always seemed to me when we come to discuss crime news, we need a definition to start with. If you will examine the criticisms that the leaders of the public made concerning objectionable news the newspapers handle, I think you will find it come more under the head of scandal news than technically crime news. The Rhinelander case was a scandal story and it had not to do technically with crime but with a civil suit for divorce and if you will look over the strong criticisms you will find that the criticisms have more to do with the Rhinelander cases than with the first class murders that we play up on the front page.

I believe that a real gory murder with lots of mystery is likely to be a first class newspaper story—something like Macbeth, something with lots of blood in it and particularly lots of mystery and that may be told in a very detailed way and not much harm done to the public mind, including the youthful mind. The fact is the way we do it has far more to do with the harm done than the mere fact of printing has done. I would like to see the subject of scandal news handled separately by some man who is a first class editor on that subject for it is my belief more harm is done by newspapers in the wrong handling of scandal news than by any other department of news handled in newspapers.

Now while I am on my feet, there was a Frenchman over here a couple of years ago who gave an interview to EDITOR & PUBLISHER about the American newspaper and it was his criticism that they lacked a sense of proportion. They were unable, seemingly, to discriminate between little facts and big facts.

An editor with a sense of the dramatic may see in a thing that is really a little thing so far as the size of the crime is concerned or the size of the scandal, a chance to play up something that is melodramatic and arouse curiosity in the mind of the reader and our chief sin is we play upon that human element in us all—curiosity—too much. It is that element of curiosity that will account for a great deal of scandal news. Along with that, the fact of competition among newspapers—one newspaper being afraid the other newspaper is going to get ahead of him and he will take a relatively little thing and in order that he will have the better story and bigger sale, he will play that up. The newspaper that distributes its product largely to the home doesn't have the same problem that the newspaper in the great cities have with the competition and therefore it plays up certain things in order to get ahead of the other fellow.

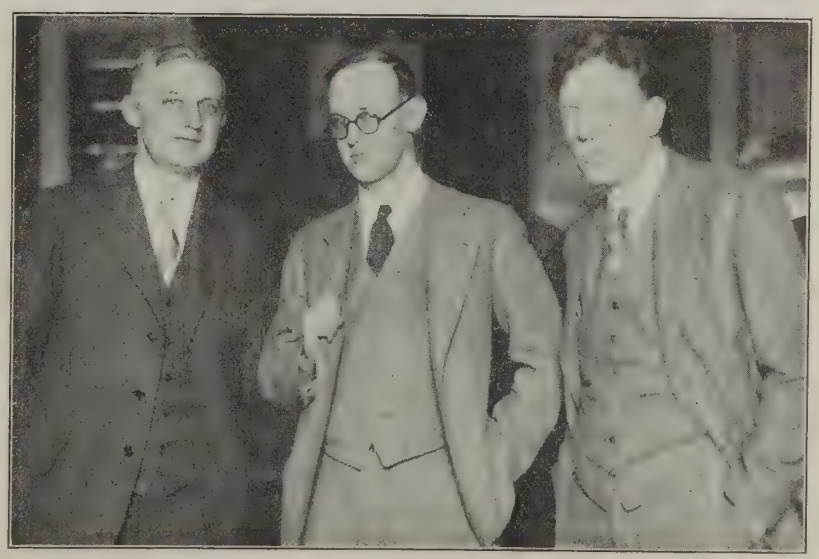
Secretary Hopwood: I suppose all the members of the Society have heard the elephant story. For the benefit of those who have not, the elepehant story runs something like this: An Englishman, a Frenchman, a German, a Russian and a Pole were each asked individually to prepare a monograph on the elephant.

The Englishman packed up his hunting kit, went to the interior of Africa and produced a work entitled "The Elephant and How to Shoot Him."

The Frenchman also went to Africa, pursued his studies for the same time and produced an article called "The Elephant and His Amours."

The German didn't go to Africa but to the libraries of Berlin and produced a three-volume work entitled "An Introduction to the Study of the Elephant."

The Russian spent no time at all but immediately propounded a treatise entitled "The Elephant; Does he Exist?"



The Pole, with about the same amount of thought, produced a monograph entitled, "The Elephant and His Relation to the Struggle for Polish Liberty."

I wondered a great many times in this connection just what sort of monograph an American would produce on the same topic and I wonder sometimes in view of certain studies and analyses that I have made of American newspapers, whether the editors of this country aren't trying to ram down the throats of the public a lot of material that the public absolutely does not want to take.

About a year ago in January, I made a detailed analysis of six great American newspapers, cataloging the articles which appeared on the first page of each one of those newspapers for six days of a certain week. I picked a very conservative newspaper, a very radical newspaper, or at least a sensational newspaper, and four newspapers which I suppose we would classify as about average or somewhere between the two extremes and I found that you could take the classification, crime news, and put on top of that scandal news and on top of that accidents and on the chart I made as a result of those investigations, these three columns wouldn't begin to approach the total amount of first page space which had been devoted by these six newspapers to affairs of government. Government outranked any other classification by more than two to one and all classifications put together would not have greatly exceeded the amount of space devoted to Government matters.

In face of the constant hammering and pressure by American newspapers on this class of news, it is extremely difficult to get to the polls at the Presidential election more than fifty per cent. of your voters. In the city of Cleveland, we have something like 300,000 people eligible to vote at a municipal election. We held an election for the City Council in Cleveland last November, the Council being the only important Governmental body we have under city managerial government and we managed to muster to the polls something like 90,000 out of the 300,000. If anybody will enlighten me as to what the American theory is as to the journalistic elephant I would be obliged.

Register which I was asked to describe was an experiment in the technique of newspaper work and it did not go to the general question of news itself. Our experiment has demonstrated that crime news is not the character of news as a whole that people look for on the front page of the paper and I think we should find ourselves in this discussion and we are not here really as citizens, but if we discuss it as newspaper men we shall find the quality of the front page is the unexpectedness of the event. It is not important that the reports of our Government affairs appear on the front page unless they are unexpected.

Tom Wallace, Louisville Courier-Journal: I don't want to go to the extent to say that crime should be segregated except in principle.

While I think we have too much space in the headlines on crime, I think we need not be oversensitive of the public's views of what ought to be printed. I was living near the scene of the Floyd Collins case and we were more criticized for playing up Floyd Collins, which was neither a crime nor a scandal, than we are for playing up murders. They even went the length of believing we had a dummy in the hole in the ground to feed the headlines of the newspapers and that we were making a large amount of money. When the body was ready to be moved, it was necessary to remove the cloth from the corpse to convince them it had really existed. It cost us a net loss of about $15,000, one of the details of which was a jump in circulation with its white paper demands.

Marvin Creager, Milwaukee Journal: One phase that hasn't been brought out, aside from the matter of crime news and moral responsibility the papers have regarding that, is the matter of segregation. Ingham's paper, I believe, tried the experiment by segregating crime news, by which I understand he put all crime news in one part of the paper.

I think there is too much segregation in our papers now, too much segregation and too many departments.

I would like to see frequently, and often bring it about, a sport story on the front page. I would like to see a story that could be considered for the women's page on the front page. I would like to see frequently, and occasionally use my influence in that direction, a market story on the front page. I think the tendency is too much toward measuring our news by rule of thumb, classifying it and putting it in some particular part of the paper. I think we assist materially in making uninteresting papers by doing it. I wish there was someone around our office to save it from getting into routine. Routine crime has no place in the paper. If you are printing routine news, don't print it; don't print a thing simply because it is crime or something else unless it be a matter of market reports or something of daily routine importance.

I like to have on the front page something you don't expect to see there, as Ingham says. It need not be unimportant to be unexpected. Neither need it be crime. But I do think the tendency is due largely to not intentionally following a line of least resistance, but nevertheless that has a great deal to do with it.

Grove Patterson, Toledo Blade: I for one am getting a little fed up on this question of crime news at the luncheon club and other clubs. As a matter of fact, the amount of crime news printed in American newspapers really is not excessive. Mr. Hopwood suggested this in his survey. As you know, the New York World announced some time ago that a group of metropolitan newspapers were studied and it was found that news of politics, news of business, news of amusement, news of sports, all preceded news of crime in volume. Crime, including the detection of crime and the apprehension of criminals, to which processes nobody could possibly object, occupied only about 22 per cent. of the total volume of space of the members of this group. All of you know that English newspapers print news of crime in far greater detail than American newspapers, yet when Sir Robert Peacock, chief magistrate of Manchester, was recently in America in attendance upon a convention of police magistrates, he said this rather astonishing thing: "If your American newspapers would cooperate with the police department in the manner that English newspapers do and print more detail about the crime as we do in England, you would make your country unsafe for criminals. You do not print enough about crime."

That set me to wondering, and in connection with that statement, I found interesting the statistics in the year 1924. There were in one American city—out of deference to Mr. Dennis, I will not name it—347 murders, and in the same or similar periods the preceding year there were in the city of London 27 murders. There is in more than one American city a greater number of murders a year than all of England and Wales, and yet English newspapers print more crime news and detail than we do.

I do think that a great deal of the criticism we hear every place is because people are interested in crime. A criminal story attracts the attention quickly. It creates a criminal effect. It is the thing he talks to his neighbor about. Crime criticizers, roughly speaking, are the most voracious crime readers. When you analyze the thing as the New York World has, when you compare the mount of crime news printed in the English papers compared with American papers, when you get the evidence submitted by Sir Robert Peacock and others, you find the amount of crime news you are talking about is not excessive, and I am pretty well fed up on the criticism of uninformed persons and Rotarians with whom I come in contact.

Verne Marshall, Cedar Rapids Evening Gazette: May I make a suggestion to the program committee of next year? I have attended two of these meetings, last year and this year, and heard this same circle running on crime news, and we will be hearing it 25 years from now because we will all be printing crime news 25 years from now. I know one paper that will, at least.

Now, there is some responsibility resting on the shoulders of newspaper editors other than deciding where in the paper to print crime news. I think there is, and I would like to suggest to the program committee for next year it could do very well for the editors who are members of this Association if it would get right here in Washington one good speaker who knows the immigration problem and tell the editors of this country what is the matter with the crime situation and what creates so much crime news for them.

Possibly some of the men from New York here today will remember that only a few weeks ago in New York City a round table of some of our high-brows was held at which immigration was discussed, and a certain college professor of considerable renown said that we still should conduct a melting pot and let them all come in. A gentleman from a certain foreign country, also well known here and elsewhere in America, said: "If you you want to let us send you our defectives, we will send them to you, but God pity America!"

Incidentally, Mr. Dennis just last Wednesday called attention to one of the good effects of mentioning the crime news. In an editorial in the Chicago Daily News was mention of the little town of Hadley, Mich. The manager of a telephone exchange there had been reading in the Chicago and Michigan newspapers of bank robberies. Out in our country, the banks are being broken into and going broke very rapidly these days. This man at Hadley had seen that the bank robbers were busy all about him.

One day, looking out of his office window, he saw a big touring car driving up to a bank across the street. Four men got out of it, all strangers. Immediately realizing something unusual was going on, having read of all these bank robberies, he got busy on the telephone. In five minutes, eight or ten men with shotguns arrived, in answer to his call. Two minutes after that, there was a commotion in the bank, and one minute after that three of the robbers were lying dead in the street. The fourth man was caught shortly afterward in his car two miles away.

All of this happened because that telephone man had read the crime news on the front page.

STATESMEN AND JOURNALISTS PARTNERS UNDER MODERN MOB'S MASTERY

By WILLIAM HARD

Address Before American Society of Newspaper Editors, on Friday.

I AM assigned to answer the question: "Are American Newspapers Doing Their Political Job, and What Is it?"

We have two duties, as I see it, one to the politicians, and one to the workers.

What is our duty toward the politicians? I conceive it is to expose their wickedness, when it exists, but to conserve their good reputation, when they deserve it, and to help build up in this country whatever respect and whatever honor may be justifiably possible for government and for those who through the practice of politics exercise and perpetuate the arts of government.

It is our duty, in so far as we can truthfully accomplish it, to hold up before the young a vision of government, of politics, of public life, which will attract our ablest and noblest men and women into direct service to their country.

Do we discharge this duty? I contend that I, you, all of us, in mass, and on the whole, fall far short of discharging this duty.

We pour out upon politicians and upon politics not only the vials of needed wrath but also whole torrents of totally unnecessary invective and contempt. We teach the young to despise politicians and politics and to fear to plunge themselves into what we loathingly describe as "the political cesspool," where they know that even if they save their characters from the mud of the pool itself they will nevertheless lose their characters in our columns whenever they differ with us on a public issue.

I will give you an illustration. Six years ago Mr. Johnson and Mr. Borah and Mr. Reed of the United States Senate rose to differ with the mass of us on the issue of the League of Nations. That policy is generally accepted now as a patriotic public policy.

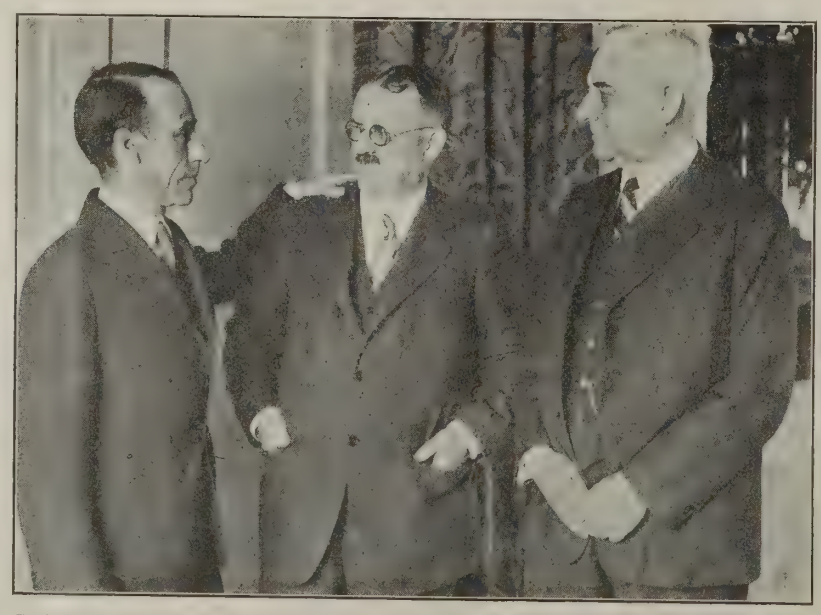
As for us, however, how did we treat the senatorial opponents of the League of Nations in 1919? I recently have been re-reading some of our utterances.

"Noisy wind-bags." "Blind reactionaries." "Poisonous partisans." "Cheap politicians." Unscrupulous politicians." "Ignorant politicians." "Pigmy-minded politicians." "Politicians."

In the mass of newspapers those epithets were, at that time, the only earnings of the public servants who, in a little lonely group, dared to hold aloft the standard of a policy now respectable enough to be the policy of the Republic and of our favorite hero, Calvin Coolidge.

But what we did to Johnson and Borah and Reed has never been and never can be undone. Their policy has triumphed, but on their Senatorial togas there will always remain the marks of the vituperation which we hurled at them.

I contend that if we mean to improve the politics of this country we must be more cautious in the tearing down of the men who enter politics. I think when I stand on the last day before the Great White Throne, the punishment which I would most deserve and which would cause me the most pain would be to have the Devil read me certain numerous articles which from time to time I have written assailing the patriotism of public men whom afterwards I discovered to be at least as patriotic as I.



We should, I say, be more temperate, more just. It involves an abandonment of our present incessant sneers at politics as a whole. It involves an effort to create a public life safe from unnecessary abuse by us.

I come now to the second part of our political job—our duty to the voters. The main part of our duty is to instruct them regarding the merits of public issues and regarding the contending arguments of public men and thus give this country a stimulated and an informed citizenship at the ballot-box.

I contend we often fall under a certain condemnation which we frequently unsparingly visit upon politicians. We say they yield to the mob. I fear we often yield to the mob.

The mob wants news. The mob wants personalities. The mob will read that Senator Pepper spoke on the World Court yesterday. It will even read some sentences from Senator Pepper in quotation marks. At any rate, we hope it will read them. So we proceed in the Senate press gallery to pick out some of Senator Pepper's most piquant and striking sentences and we put quotation marks around them and file them on the wire and they perhaps get printed; but not in one case out of twenty do such excerpts

EDITORIAL TECHNIQUE REVEALED IN FORUM

Discussion of Circulation Methods and News Policies—Universal versus Individual Copy Desk—Means of Holding Country Readers Against Small Town Paper Rivalry

EDITORS who had been content to listen up to Saturday morning took the floor in the open forum on editorial room practices and costs led by George B. Armstead, managing editor of the Hartford Courant. Some interesting, if not new, lights on the universal copy desk system were brought out in the discussion. The fight of the large daily to maintain its small-town circulation against local competition was revealingly handled by several speakers of both sides. A digest of the forum follows:

GEORGE B. ARMSTEAD, Hartford Courant: Among newspaper editors and editorial departments in the country, there never has been any effort made, to my knowledge, for a continual and organized interchange of ideas and methods as to news gathering and the covering of our various territories in the state, so that an editor in Hartford or in Oklahoma would know what the general practice was in cities of this size and those that are larger, as to office organization and the division of the money allotted to him to conduct the editorial end of the paper.

I have written out a little suggestion here that engineers, teachers, doctors, lawyers, all make it one of the prime features of their organizations to discuss technicalities of their business, and I propose the question to you, whether it would not be possible for newspaper men to compare methods of operation with profit, just as the doctors and scientists do.

Of course, perhaps, the first thing would be an analysis of cost and comparison of methods as to efficiency and economy. It seems to me there must be two or three possible ways of covering a city, which are superior to the many others in vogue. There must be a few ways of covering the state which are superior to the quite wide variety of methods used today by papers from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Some plans of organizing the divisions of the editorial department ought to be more economical than other plans.

I would like to know, for instance, what proportion of the total editorial department expense, in papers of various sizes and grades, is used for reportorial salaries? What proportion goes toward the personnel of the city desk, the copy desk and what is spent in suburban coverage and how much in the coverage of the state as a whole?

On efficient newspapers, what is the size of the reportorial staff? For instance, in a city of 100,000, 200,000 and 300,000 and so on up until we cover the entire country and the requirements of this Society, what do these things amount to?

How much is spent on the editing of and gathering of local sports news and the reporting, and how much is spent on other service that the paper gives?

One problem that comes to my mind is the problem of the telegraph and telephone expense. I would like to know if any paper has a good method of keeping down the telephone charges, which take up quite a percentage of our reportorial expenditure. That takes in the calling-in of correspondents. At the end of the year that expense amounts to a great deal. There may be the using of the telephone by a reporter a half dozen times when three calls would have sufficed. The same thing applies to telegraph bills.

We would like to get some sort of contribution to this idea. I did it in our own office. I found out that our payroll is 46 per cent of our total expenditure in our editorial department, but I wasn't able to ascertain in the time I had just what percentage of that goes for reportorial expense and the various other activities, such as the Sunday magazine and the rotogravure section.

But, I did find out that 17 per cent goes to correspondents around the state, outside of our suburban territory. The reporters' expense is only 1½ per cent. To the A. P. we pay only 11 per cent. Our telegraph tolls are 2½ per cent. Our telephone calls amount to 5½ per cent. We spend 7 per cent on features. Illustrating amounts to 8 per cent and the miscellaneous items make up the balance of the 100 per cent.

I would like to know if we are spending a larger percentage on some of these features than it is the general practice to spend in papers of this kind throughout the country. We might effect some economy there or we might find that we are doing a better job in that particular field which would warrant the additional expenditure.

My proposal is that we have a round table method of discussion and get some enlightening facts and figures so that we may know what the other fellow is doing in his job.

We have an office organization in Hartford, which I find is somewhat different than the organizations in other cities that I have visited. I find the Boston Globe reads all the copy on one desk. Its copy readers are men of long experience.

The sports editors send their copy to this one desk, which is quite unusual, I think. Whether that is more efficient than the method of having the sports department edit their own copy, write their own heads, and make up their own pages, I would like to know.

I think the Society here might, by comparison of methods in various offices, find out if that is any better, or if it simply is a local condition, better in the Boston Globe office, or whether it is really a good scheme for newspapers in general.

We cover our state by what I think is an old-fashioned method of a country correspondent in each town. They are pretty hard to get in high grade. At one time we have a wonderful news gatherer who has difficulty in writing the English language. Another time, we have a very fine literary artist who forgets that the golf club burned down last night, or at least wasn't interested.

Now, how to keep the good correspondents and get better ones and how to keep them on their toes is a problem that we have never solved 100 per cent.

One suggestion is that one state editor travel around the state in an automobile and visit these people, in the same way that a fire chief visits his various stations in a city, telling them what was the matter with last night's report, what we would like tomorrow, and keeping a very close check on their work which we can't do over the telephone of course.

Another idea is to have somebody write letters, which is not very satisfactory and takes a lot of time.

Another idea is to let them go on their own.

The A. P. coverage of the state is never, of course, 100 per cent. Almost every paper that I know about in the East has its own state coverage in addition to the Associated Press service, for obvious reasons, that they require in certain areas of the state a great deal more news than the Associated Press would be justified in attempting to handle.

There is one other thing that we have tried to discover in Connecticut, and that is, how necessary is the small town gossip in the state to the paper in a city if you are going to hold the circulation in these small towns.

In some small towns where we have a circulation of 300 or 400 we do nothing in a news way unless the Associated Press gives us a report from that town. In other words, we don't tell about the meetings of the sewing circle and the small local weddings, and still we hold that circulation. In another town we find that we can't hold the circulation unless we have a local letter giving all the gossip of the town.

I would like to know if anybody has solved that problem, what the experience of other papers is as to that problem of holding circulation in small towns around the state without a news letter, and we in Hartford, frankly, don't know. We are trying out an experiment now of cutting out some towns to see what the result is, cutting out the detailed news from those towns to see what the result is in circulation. Perhaps somebody has tried that twenty years ago and arrived at a conclusion.

I thought possibly this Society, if we could have these round-table discussions on different problems, would give the various members the experience, a better idea of the experience that has been gained in the various parts of the country on the problems of the individual editor.

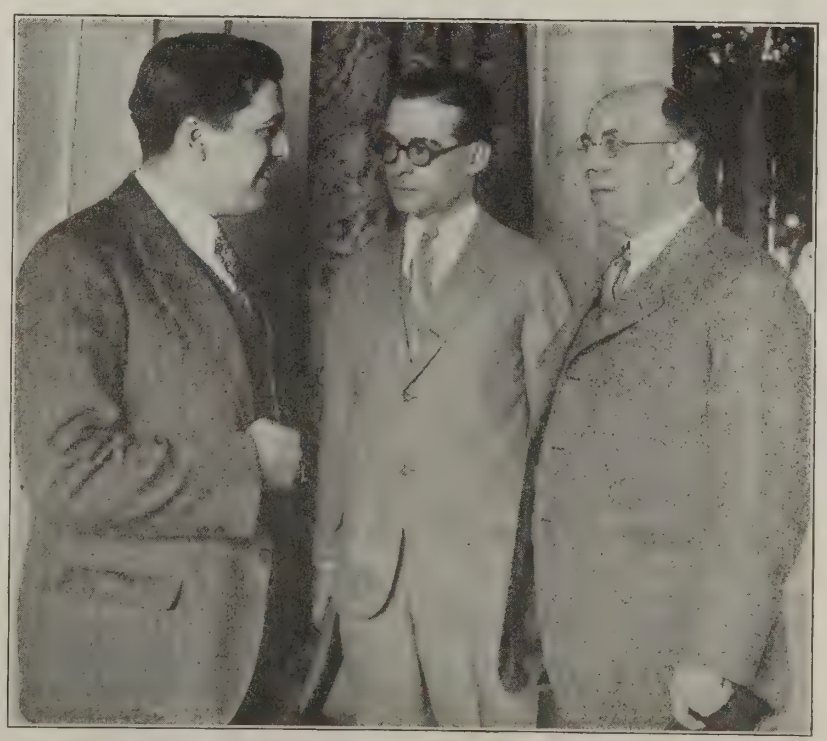
I noticed recently the New York papers have gone back to long lists of names of those who attend dinners. The New York World carried about a column the other morning of Chamber of Commerce diners. We cut that out some time ago in Hartford, supposed it wasn't necessary. But the New York World is an important paper, and it seems to be the opinion there and on the Times that these names are worth while.

When I first began newspaper work, the city editor clamored for names. It was the bane of my life to get these long lists of prominent and otherwise citizens who attended dinners and meetings.

Now, is that worth while? If it is worth while for the New York Times to go back to this thing which they dropped a long time ago, and for the New York World to do it, perhaps we ought to go back to it, too.

Our city editor thinks that names are a wonderful thing, but, as I say, we dropped them a few years ago, gradually. We simply gave the meat of the meeting and left out the names of those who attended, except the more important ones, possibly.

I can think of many other problems, as you can. For instance, the most important one of all, and that is the amount of money which the publisher is willing we should use on the editorial department. Unless you know that, that other figures that you use on reporters and city editors are not very beneficial.



The publisher of a paper in Connecticut says that we are getting a certain percentage of money, gross revenue taken in, and that we are getting too much. I would like to know whether we are getting more in proportion than other papers devote to that same department. It seems to me that is one of the things we ought to know. Otherwise, how can we compare our coverage, our efficiency, with that of other papers in cities from 100,000 to 500,000? I should think the man in a city of 500,000 would like to know if he is getting along as efficiently on 10 per cent of the gross revenue as the man halfway across the continent is doing with a lesser amount of money.

I wonder if those facts couldn't be brought out in what I would call round-table discussions here, and as it is called this year, the open forum.

SECRETARY HOPWOOD: There are one or two points, from our own experience, that may be of benefit to Mr. Armstead. In the first place, within the last five or six months, we have changed our copy desk system from the individual desk system to the universal desk system. Under the old type of organization, city copy was handled on one desk with four copy readers, telegraph copy was handled on another desk with four copy readers, including a telegraph editor, and the state copy was handled on an individual state desk, and the sporting copy in its own department.

With three editions to get out, our theory is that the first edition, which is for street sale purposes, should contain a preponderance of city news, inasmuch as that edition does not circulate outside the city. That required a demand on the local end of the copy desk early in the evening.

Then, about an hour and a half after that, the state edition which carries a minimum of local news and a preponderance of state and telegraph news, goes to press. That in turn entailed a heavy demand on the telegraph end of the desk.

Then, in the city edition, we swung back again to the local end of the desk. The result of that was that there was no distribution of the load on the desk. Certain parts of it were overworked at times and other parts of it had nothing to do.

We set up a universal copy desk, which, as you know, of course, is not at all a novel idea, and each man on that desk is supposed to handle either local, state, or telegraph copy, as the head of the desk passes it to him. The telegraph editor, the city editor, and the state editor, all have their individual desks. They are in receipt of all the copy that comes into the office in the fields they are supposed to cover. They pass that copy immediately to the head copy reader on the universal desk, who reads no copy at all himself, but sees that there is a constant distribution of copy to the various copy readers, so that every man on the desk is busy constantly.

Now, the head of the desk directing that passes out local copy for the first edition primarily, state and telegraph copy for the second edition, and then holds back his city edition local news until the state edition is cleared and out of the way, and then he distributes his local news.

We found we could not operate that desk quite as economically as we could operate the copy reading when divided into three parts. It takes one more man, because under the old system a man who was head of the local desk also read copy. We do find, however, that it makes a very great difference in the efficiency of delivering your copy to your composing room. The particular kind of copy that you want for the given edition for which you are working reaches the composing room at the time when it should, and copy which is not necessary at that time is held back until the machines are cleared for that which comes later. And it has been a very satisfactory re-arrangement, as far as efficient delivery of the copy to the composing room is concerned.

I rather think, though this couldn't be demonstrated by figures probably, that it has made as much economy in composing room operation as the additional copy reader costs to operate the desk on that basis.

Just one other point that I would like to speak about, since I am on my feet, and that is the question of state coverage by correspondents and by news services.

There has been recently, at least in our part of the country, a very considerable development of state Associated Press service. And it seemed to me that with the development of the syndicate feature, which is peddled to every newspaper in the state, and with the development of a more highly efficient Associated Press service which practically all of the daily papers in the state find within their reach the problem of the larger city paper in competition with the smaller city paper is becoming a very real one.

We have on our staff of correspondents something like 150 men. We have a man in every county capital in the state of Ohio, and there are 88 counties in the state. Each county is covered by its own correspondent. And then there are about 60 or 70 more who are assigned to towns which are not county seats. It is a very large, and as those organizations go, a fairly efficient organization.

And under the old system, before the Associated Press began to develop its state service as intensively as it has, we were able to deliver a very large amount of state news which was peculiar to the Plain Dealer. As the situation exists in Ohio now there is an Associated Press Bureau in Columbus, an Associated Press Bureau in Dayton, one in Cincinnati and one in Cleveland, so that practically all of the state news which naturally would come in to the larger papers in Cincinnati, Columbus and Cleveland is distributed to the smaller members on the state wire of the Associated Press, so there practically isn't any such thing any more as exclusive state news so far as the larger papers are concerned.

There is a certain economy in the operation of the Associated Press service in that it cuts down your tolls and your correspondents' salaries, but there is a very distinct disadvantage in that it is strengthening the smaller city papers at the expense of the larger city papers. And I think the situation in practically every large city where that condition has been developing and growing in its particular field brings us face to face with the problem of just what is the large city paper to do to maintain its individuality and its appeal as against what seems to me to be undoubtedly the growing strength of the smaller city newspapers.

I have been watching the operations of the newspapers in Ohio in cities of from 25,000 to 100,000 or 125,000, and there isn't any question at all that in the last ten years those newspapers have immeasurably added to the quality of their products. You talk about covering sewing circle news and that sort of thing. It isn't a bit of good for the metropolitan paper to do that.

What is the situation the metropolitan paper faces? In the first place, it can't cover the intensive local news as well as the local paper is able to do it—just can't be done. In the second place, the local paper under present systems of feature distributions buys the same features that the larger city paper does, unless it exempts territory, and that is what we have done. We have said that no feature which is purchased by the Cleveland Plain Dealer can be sold anywhere in the state of Ohio north of the city of Columbus. But if you leave it wide open your local paper has just as good features as your city paper. It has better local news, and with the development of the Associated Press service and the expansion of the Associated Press and other news services to the smaller papers all of the important news of the country is covered in your local paper.

The big city paper's problem is one of somehow or other by special writers, by special features, by attention to the things which are beyond the reach of the smaller newspapers to develop and maintain its individuality in the face of that competition.

It is probably an excellent thing for the newspaper business as a whole that the newspapers in the smaller cities have made the remarkable gains in quality, that they undoubtedly have made in the last ten or fifteen years.

I wrote to Mr. Hough and asked him to write something for the bulletin about how the local paper met big city competition. And the more I think about it the more I think I should have written a piece myself answering how the big city newspaper meets the local newspaper competition. I think that is a real problem that every man who is on either end of the question will have to give pretty serious consideration.

MARC A. ROSE, Buffalo News: What Mr. Hopwood had to say got me to my feet for the first time in the meeting, because that touches us very closely. Our situation, with apologies to Cleveland, is very much the same. And we have come to these conclusions, that you can not compete with the small city daily—it can't be done. Of course, I am speaking now from the point of view of the evening newspaper man. I think the morning newspaper has a better chance.

We have studied the careful and detailed circulation reports that are brought into our office, and one of the first things that we noticed was that in the small town, where there was a daily newspaper, our evening competitor far outsold us, but in the small town in which there was no newspaper we could outsell him by a very considerable margin. That rather disconcerting fact set us to try to analyze the situation.

The analysis of that situation, I think, gives the key to the situation. And we reached the same conclusion that Mr. Hopwood makes.

We were primarily a newspaper. Our emphasis was upon news. Our competitor was primarily a feature newspaper, with his emphasis upon features. You see the answer at once.

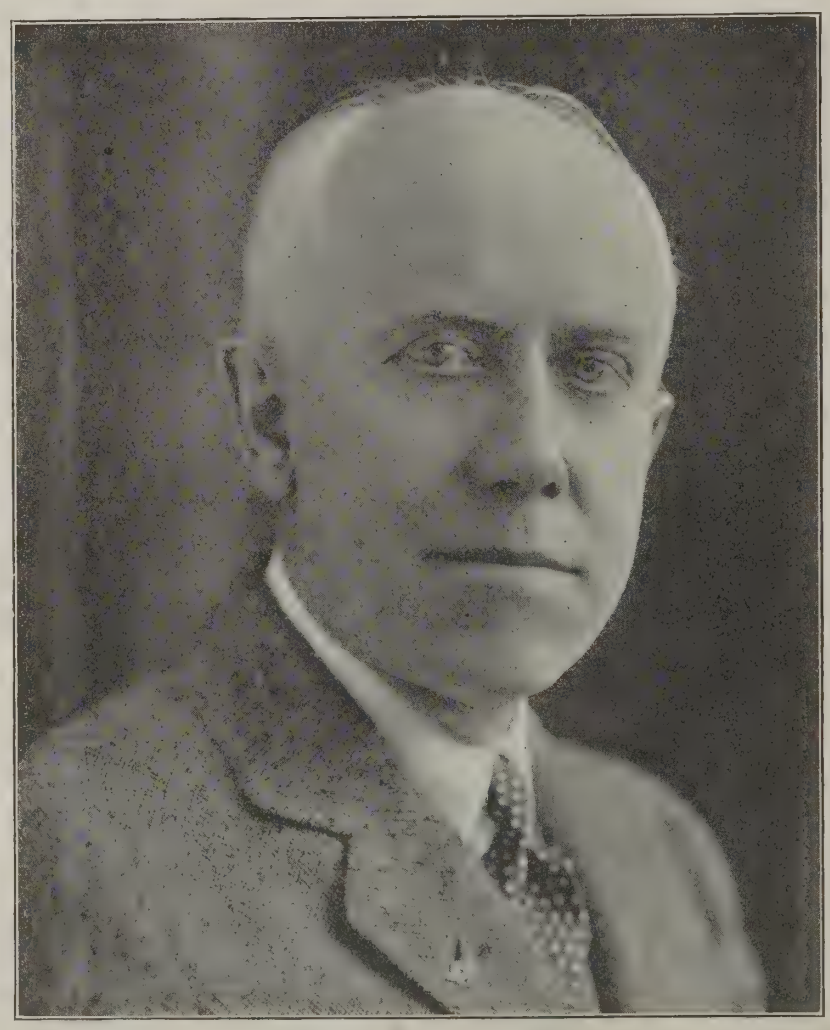
In the town where there was a good, strong daily our paper was too much like the small local daily, but the other paper was entirely different, and when they wanted something more to read besides the local paper they bought our competitor's, but in the town where we were giving a distinct service which no local agancy gave we could outsell him.

We have decided that our only salvation lies in the things that Mr. Hopwood pointed out, of trying to give things which no small town newspaper can afford to give. For instance, a page of pictures every day which costs us an amount of money I don't like to think about, because we make all our own cuts. They are in the first edition. We subscribe, I think, to every photograph agency in the United States and cull from them the cream. It costs money. We think it is justified for just this reason, that no small town newspaper can afford to do that. And if they buy mats, why, they make themselves ridiculous because the reader says, "Why, that was in the Buffalo paper four days or a week ago."

Unfortunately, the small town newspaper proprietor isn't quite so sure that we can't compete with him in his own field as we are. And that brings up the question of correspondents.

The development of the Associated Press state news service has been a life saver to us, because we were rapidly getting into a desperate situation. In the cities near us, and there are several which are large enough to have good strong local dailies, the proprietors of these local dailies were making things very, very hard for us. We couldn't get correspondents.

You can't go out and get the town lawyer or postmaster to act as correspondent in a city which is large enough to have a newspaper of its own. You are almost obliged to find your correspondent with the local daily, and his prime consideration is to his own newspaper and he obeys the instructions handed to him.



They were making it pretty tough sledding for us to get any news out of those towns promptly. And we have been among the instigators of the Associated Press in our section of the state who tried to get some kind of protection from the news associations.

I wonder if anybody else has run up against that, that is, there is a concerted effort, I think, on the part of the small town dailies—don't say that I blame them, but I think they are mistaken, because I don't think they need to be afraid of us—to do this.

JOHN EISENLORD JOINS CHICAGO NEWS AS CIRCULATION DIRECTOR

John N. Eisenlord

JOHN N. EISENLORD was appointed circulation director of the Chicago Daily News by Walter Strong, the new publisher, taking up his duties Jan. 18. Mr. Eisenlord came to the Daily News after 25 years with William Randolph Hearst's Chicago Evening American. When he resigned he was circulation manager.

George Baker is to continue as circulation manager of the News. W. J. Parker and Clarence R. Duell are continuing in charge of the American's circulation department, no announcement as to Mr. Eisenlord's successor having yet been made.

Mr. Eisenlord was born and reared in Detroit. Ill-health sent his father south to Memphis, Tenn., while the son was still in his 'teens. His first newspaper job was with the Memphis Commercial-Appeal as a clerk in the delivery room. He stayed there for two years, coming to Chicago when Mr. Hearst started the American.

Mr. Eisenlord's recipe for getting ahead is old but sound.

"Tend to business. That's all."

MOORE, COOPER, FINLEY, BANQUET SPEAKERS

Idealism and Individualism Stressed By A. P. Executive—Dr. Finley Sees Need For Synoptic Courses In Education For Journalists

WITH the Secretary of War at the chairman's left, the Episcopal Bishop of Washington invoking the Divine blessing and a generous scattering of Senators and Congressmen among the diners, the Gridiron Society held its annual banquet Saturday night, Jan. 16. The speakers were Alexander P. Moore, former publisher and until recently Ambassador to Spain; Kent Cooper, general manager of the Associated Press; and Dr. John H. Finley, of the New York Times editorial staff. President Yost read a letter from L. S. Rowe, director general of the Pan-American Union, relative to the First Pan-American Congress of Journalists at Washington, April 7-13. A communication from Ulric Bell, president of the National Press Club, was also read, tendering the members the facilities of the club and describing its new building now under construction.

All three speakers devoted themselves to various phases of journalism, Mr. Moore telling of his experiences at the Spanish Court and the value of his newspaper mind in his diplomatic service. His address was not reported.

Dr. Finley addressed himself to the ideal of the newspaper man for broad culture and of the possibilities of education to that end. Mr. Cooper eulogized the reporter and voiced the high idealism which he declared was inherent in the news staff of every successful journal.

Dr. Finley's address follows:

"Balzac has called journalism the religion of democracy. Just what Balzac meant, I cannot say, but I suppose he meant to suggest that there is a deep scholar attachment to the press and faith in it as a continuing diurnal revelation and record of the Almighty's continuing revision of the earth (as the earthquakes testify) and His daily dealings with the souls of men, for, as an American poet of Baltimore, I think, said a few days ago in a bit of verse that I found on the news boys:

> I think God kept on talking when His book had gone to press,
> That He continues speaking to the listening sons of men;
> I think His voice is busy yet to teach and guide and bless
> Each, every time we ask for light, He calls to us again.

"It was another poet (tenting with a scientist he must have been) who said 'Every morn is the world made new' and if being so, there should be a record between the days to which the inhabitants of the earth may turn to see what sort of world it is which comes new to them every morning, a world in whose creation they themselves have had a part.

"The newspaper is simply the world made new every day. Balzac added that the journalists were the priests of democracy, and if so, they were priests after the order of Melchizedek, for you will remember that he had neither beginning of days nor end of life. The journalist is timeless, Einsteinian, eternal, present, ever on the edge of the 'continuum,' for, to quote a translator of Einstein, 'The continuum of events exists as a background for phenomena and the happenings occur in any region whatsoever the events are there ready to give forth their testimony, and the newspaper reporter is there to receive it.' That latter phrase is mine, not Einstein's. It is the globe-encircling altar upon which these journalistic priests minister gathering what would be called the transient into the eternal.

"Mr. Duke, when he stated his reasons for establishing his university fund of $100,000,000 did not, however, include the journalists among the six kinds of leaders whom the universities ought to train, for they are, in the order in which he named them: preachers, teachers, lawyers, chemists, engineers, and doctors. I don't know just why he took that order. It seems to me that doctors should come a bit higher at any rate, whatever is to be said about the lawyers. But certainly editors and journalists of serious purpose and trained minds belong there somewhere, perhaps between the teachers and the preachers, for they are no longer the mere stentors or town criers; they are the interpreters, the all-around men of the universe. I call them planetary precursors, and that, Senator, is something deeper than men of international-mindedness.

"Their prototype is the ancient Democritus, who, despite the range and seriousness of his thought, was called the 'laughing philosopher.' He was not a columnist, however. The first columnist, I think, was—we have no columnists on our paper—St. Simeon Stylites.

"This is just a brief record of the things in which Democritus was interested. He was abreast if not in advance of the astronomy of his day. He had traversed the greatest part of the known earth. He wrote a treatise on navigation. He was learned in physics, writing on the magnet, the rays of light and the water-clock. He was fond of music and poetry, leaving works on rhythm and harmony and the beauty of epic poems. He was a critic in matters of art. He left a book on fevers, another on prognostics, another on pestilences, another on the right way of living, and besides wrote authoritatively on agriculture, tactics, the principles of law, the calendar and colors, ethics and cheerfulness, besides being a zoologist, anatomist and psychologist.

"It seems to us that this range of Democritus is astounding for a single man, especially in these days of specialization. But it is an even wider range that the modern Democritus, the editor, must have. He must not only have a glimpse into all fields of human knowledge and achievement; he must know that way to the verge in some one subject. He must also be aware of the great abysses of human ignorance which no editorial Marcus Curtius can close, however sacrificially noble his purpose. He must not only know something about everything and everybody, but he must also know where to get the everything that is known about something. But he must not only know; he must be able to tell what he knows or get intelligibly told what others know but can not tell.

"Professor Gildersleeve once intimated that there was a certain advantage in being obliged to write at what he called finger speed. That was before the days of the typewriter. He said, the best words come to the front under such conditions, that is, if one has the best words, it is important to acquire a vocabulary for such emergencies, and if anything is to be said for the cross word puzzles which have infested the press, it is this.

"As an educator, I was accustomed to divide those who could not or did not tell the truth into three classes: first, those who did not know truth and so if they told it, told it only by accident; second, those who knew it but were not willing to tell it; third, those who knew and wished to tell it but did not know how.

"Since I have become an editor, I find that not even a research professor is more eager to know the truth or more eager to tell it than an editor is, and I find, too, that he is usually much better able to tell the truth than the research professor, because he knows how to speak to the ordinary mind.

"So if I were to make a plea to the universities, on behalf of the press, it would be to prepare a few all-around men, the pick of them (and women, too, I suppose) who should be competent to perform a planetary service not only geographically but intellectually—and I am not talking about the League of Nations now!—to be in this democratic age what Democritus was in his day to his little world.

"I know a managing editor who was prepared, when the tomb of Tut-ankh-amen was opened to enter intelligently with the archaeologist, and who when Einstein propounded his theory, had some notion of what Einstein was talking about (very few had). I found him one day trying to find geometrically the area of a triangle in the terms of its sides. I know another editor, who reported the Yale lectures on the structure of the atom so as to compel the admiration of the natural scientists, and who later reported the Williamstown Institute of Politics in such an informing manner as to win the approval of the political scientists as well as the complaint of one of the lecturers that he had reported not only what he said but also his implications.

"I use these two or three positive rather than negative illustrations to support my appeal for synoptic courses in history and in science, in philosophy and in literature, as well as special courses which lead into the presence of the infinite in some one or more sectors of human search and struggle—planetary courses which will enable those who follow them to be something more than smatterers, if something less than ultimate experts—interpreters of what is added day by day to the continuum, preparing them for service in a super-university in which the professors are not as the Ancient of Days but as the Renewers of the Foremost Files of Time, carrying the contributions of events and their interpretations to the enrichment of the human continuum—the race mind, which in turn will inform the individual mind of its wisdom, so that each may have the best that anywhere seems to be.

"These selected ones must, above all, as I have said, know how to tell the truth, and they have to do it with words, in cold type.

"In the 'Terrible Meek,' the dramatist presents a scene in which a cross is dimly seen in the background, and in the foreground an English Tommy and an English captain are shown in conversation. The Tommy is saying that it is too bad that one should come to this just for the saying of a few words. 'Words, words,' said the captain, 'words are the most powerful things in the world. All the good or bad that gets done in the world is done by words.'

"Truly, in the beginning was the Word, but it will be with man to the end of time, that is, until God stops speaking to men, until the reporter has filed his last copy and the editor has made his last comment, until the last edition has gone to press, and Gabriel's trump has been heard by radio around the earth."

"'Ours is a public work,' Mr. Cooper declared. It is not enough, therefore, privately to apply to ourselves a code of ethics in our profession. I know that your Society has a code of ethics, and that you are interested in that code. Otherwise you would not be here. But if you, editors of great American newspapers, would constantly proclaim a written code of ethics, a moral stamp would be placed on the profession of value, not only in upholding reportorial standards, but in raising the newspapers themselves to a higher plane in public estimation. It would give the layman a measure by which he could judge how well that code was observed.

"Take the layman into your confidence. Your relation to the public should not permit of secrets. Let the layman in on your ideals. Why not reduce your code to a brief but consistent form, and publish it daily. If you cannot run it daily, then do it once a week, or once a month, but print it somewhere often enough to make it known as a part of your self and your newspaper.

"If you do this, and with this Society requiring strict observance of that code, the time will come when memberships in good standing in this society will be a part of the good will assets of your papers.

"It was idealism that made the newspaper the practical success that it is today.

"The editorial effort which perceives that its opportunity is founded upon sentiment for an idealism not only contributes to constructive human relationships, but it brings financial success. In fact, the former is responsible for the latter. A successful journal may disavow any idealistic aim. Its owner may have no sentiment, and unconscious of any idealism himself he may look upon his property as a machine for producing money. Such a conception is apt to sneer at sentimentalists and idealists. But whether or not owned by him who disavows ideals, I do not know of a successful journal which has not somewhere at the heart of the enterprise a throbbing idealism which may be embodied in the personality of the editor or managing editor, or better still, in the entire news staff.

"I do not know why news men are surcharged with sentiment for their work, or why they put into their work that which savors so much of human appeal. I say I do not know. But if I were called to suggest a reason why successful news men have a moving sentiment, I could not answer that they come by it intentionally, or through any studious process of obtaining it. Nor do I believe that news men are born, not made. I distinctly hold that they are made, and that they are not conscious of the processes that make them. Any number of reasons may throw a youngster into journalism, but only one reason can keep him there. If he begins at the point of greatest advantage he begins as a reporter.

"And what an amazing number of sources of human contact are opened to the reporter. He must have to do with all kinds and classes of people. He sees mankind in all his moods, and sees him at close range. He sees him in misfortune and in fortune. He sees the hovel and the palace, and if he has the stuff that makes good reporters—and please don't forget this!—he sees matters of news interest in both places. Human passion in its varying aspects is revealed to him, and if he has gotten the reportorial spirit, he glories in the opportunity in turn to reveal to others through the printed word what it has been his to see and learn. Veritably a reportorial experience is a a baptism in the stream of humanity if anything is, and reporting is recording the human spectacle. If the process does not make reporters capable of having sentiment that fosters idealism, then there is nothing that can bring any man in any endeavor to have ideals. It is because necessary contact with the joys and sorrows of the poor and rich brings him, altogether subconsciously, to a broad conception of and interest in humanity that the real news man can never wholly cut the tie which early in life bound him to journalism, for so long as he may live he will find no other field of activity that will bring him so intimately into contact with the throbbing realities created or confronted by man.

"Now reporters graduate into executive positions, into editorships, or into specialized work. Maturity in life brings to the mind a philosophy by which early reportorial experience may be called upon to discern deeper things, matters of larger import and questions of moment. This is a natural development of the journalist's field of mental and practical activity. He who was a local reporter or local editor becomes interested in matters of state, national and world wide interest. In this field more than in the local his store of scholastic and collegiate knowledge carries him on.

"It is at this point that the trend of the journalistic mind becomes of greater concern to the management of a press association. I assure you that concern is a deep one. It is of mutual importance that the contact be personal and intimate.

"In the Associated Press work, for example, there is intensified effort at this time to round out the picture of life.

"Let me explain the phrase 'rounding out the picture.' Not every American who reads a newspaper is an economist, statesman, banker, man of commerce or professional man. There are those, and they number millions, who are not exclusively absorbed by affairs of business or state. Women, alone, who as a whole are better readers of general news than men, do not generally immerse themselves in news of business and state.

"The first journalistic aim must be to serve the largest possible reading clientele. To do this there must be news to meet the decent taste of varied interest—any taste, of course, except that of the depraved. Man's mind is not always heavy with sombre serious thought. Sometimes he is interested in the light and curious things, and he should be. This being true, news of heavy import only partially meets the requirements of interest. The desideratum is that all men will find interest in all classes of news. We cannot effect this result in mankind, but we can put the varied menu on the plate even though we cannot make each individual eat it all.

"So far I have not stressed that this rounded out picture must include the story of what is going on abroad. That I do now. And that must be a rounded out picture indeed. Life abroad may or may not be thought strange to our people but whatever that life is, it must be pictured in its complete activity. We are inclined to be smugly provincial—so smug in this respect that it is not necessary to stress to you what is being done about news matters at home. We are watched upon that with precise discrimination, and so fully do we do our duty in respect to making domestic news all-inclusive that I sometimes hope we are sating Americans with their provincialism. You can well afford to use more of the picture of life abroad.

"The perfection which press association co-operation has demonstrated in the way of covering world news facts economically has brought on the more or less economical syndicated editorial news comment which, having in mind the interesting availability of local interpretative talent, is costly at any price, if our large papers are to have individuality. It has been well said that the 'awful uniformity of flash and flare, of point and job in the newspaper business, is not necessary. A turkey raised in one's own barnyard is better than a chestnut-fed bird after it has been hauled in a refrigerator car from Rhode Island—and even a second rate ham is mighty good eating if it is properly home cured.' And then the comment concluded that 'the editors don't think so; with one voice they agree that poor Touchstone was, in very truth, a fool when he said. "An ill favored thing, sir, but mine own."

"Personally, I am sorry to see this syndicated editorial comment. Facts in the news are facts wherever they are, and a press association report should be a fact report. But syndicated comment, interpretative or otherwise, starts an editorial goose-step up and down this board land; readers will either fall in line by reading it or they will fall out of line by avoiding all editorials. And you really want them to do neither."

SYNDICATE FAULTS EASILY REMEDIED BY COMPETENT EDITORS

Report of Editors' Committee Holds That Buyers Have Power of Control and Need But Exercise It—Demand for Celebrated Names

FOLLOWING is the report of committee on syndicates and press services, rendered to the convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, by the Chairman, Marvin W. Creager, managing editor of Milwaukee Journal:

This is not a formal report in any way; it is merely a few suggestions prepared at the suggestion of our president and it is very general.

The situation as between editors and syndicates is well illustrated by Mark Twain's venerable quip about the weather—everybody talks about it, but no one ever does anything about it. Perhaps there is no more to be done in one case than in the other.

But I have about come to the conclusion, after 20 years of newspaper work, including three years on the syndicate committee of this society, that there is nothing terrifying about the situation for any editor who refuses to be stampeded.

It may be true that syndicates have sometimes pulled the cord when editors have insisted upon sticking their heads into the noose, but frankly I think the sellers of syndicated features have more often resisted the temptation to do even that.

It seems to me a fair statement to say that most of the squeezing real or fancied that may have been done was a direct consequence of lack of self confidence on the part of the buyer.

Apparently it is possible still to convince some editors that some attractive feature, controlled outside his office, is vital to the life of his paper and to cause him to plunge into bidding contests with competitors to get it. Sober thought, I believe, will convince any practical editor that no one feature is stronger than his paper unless his paper be so anaemic that any little draft is likely to waft it away. It seems to me that I would be very jealous of any feature that I was so in awe of and would consider it a blessing if it were taken away from me.

And even if one were convinced that a feature was indispensable, he need not worry long if he loses it, for there are sure to be plenty of imitations of it on the market in a few weeks if it takes hold and often the imitations are better than the originals.

There is a tendency among editors, I believe, to take too seriously the reports of how much circulation this or that feature put on in St. Louis or Pittsburgh or Albany. If I had not heard others in whom I have every confidence, admit the same thing, I should be ashamed to make the confession, but the fact is that I have never been able to trace any appreciable increase in circulation to the addition of any one feature, nor have I ever noted any loss in circulation that could be attributed to the discontinuance of any feature. Frankly, I would feel that my paper was hanging by a pretty thin thread if it could be violently fluctuated by a change of a feature or two. Circulation managers, I believe, are subject to pretty definite statements as to what this or that feature would do, but even they are inclined to be a bit hazy on figures when called upon for a check up after the feature has been put on. One can not blame syndicate salesmen for circulating reports as to circulation miracles if editors can be found who will be influenced by such reports.

There is no refutation of the argument that syndicates make it possible for newspapers to print highly important and interesting features that the average newspaper could not afford to buy for itself. But editors should be sure that they are buying stuff that really is big and interesting.

There is too much buying by ear. Names that sound big are used to conjure with. I think we all can recall instances where widely heralded features have, on analysis, been found to be more husk than kernel. There would be far less talk about the syndicates, I am sure, if every buyer accepted his material only after examining it carefully and considering whether it met his particular need. As Dr. Frank told us at our last meeting, there is a tendency among editors to underestimate the intelligence of their readers. That fact should be kept in mind in buying features. The readers, as a rule, are not hypnotized by names that sound big to the editor. They want worthwhile stuff along with the name.

This weakness for big names frequently puts newspapers into the awkward position of building up a name by over-enthusiastic use of space and then paying fancy prices for the privilege of using the name that they have made famous. Witness the case of Red Grange who was raised to the nth power by hero-worshiping writers and who then sold the very stuff that the newspapers had used to inflate his balloon right back to the editors to inflate it all the more. If readers really are intelligent what must they think on reading daily installments of Red Grange's career in which the details of his famous sprints are told over again and again. The case of the football hero is called to your attention simply because it is a recent one. It is by no means unique. Newspapers appare enjoy building up names only to buy privilege of using them after they h become famous and generally they i nothing but the name when they m the purchase. Can we blame the syn cate for cashing in these names or owners of the name for selling them?

The most active mental work in syndicates, I believe, is in the selling rather than in the production side. first problem is to find a merchanta idea and sell it quickly. The question producing the material is likely to be secondary importance. If a good str of papers can be signed up, the feat will sell on its own momentum for a t whether it is much good or not. W would it not be a good plan for edit to take a lesson here from the syndicat Put as much thought and initiative i buying as the syndicates put into sell and there would be fewer wails fr disappointed buyers.

Syndicate men have told me frequen that they have great difficulty in sell features by unknown writers or anyth out of the beaten path. Editors, they s do not like to trust their own judgm They are eager for stuff that someb else has tried and found effective and t are ready usually to take almost anyth from a writer whose name has been ma In other words, they lack confidence themselves. No wonder they are so times imposed upon.

And another serious condition aris from this shyness toward untried ma rial is the virtual monopoly enjoyed established features and feature prod ers. It is not an easy matter to get n blood into the field under these con tions and many excellent writers have remain on individual papers through their career because they cannot pry entry into the syndicate field. Edit would be widening their field of sup and helping deserving writers if t were less afraid to try something fr a new service.

Perhaps the most discouraging thi with which I have come in contact newspaper work is the apparent difficu in getting the public to discriminate tween newspapers. A man who has h an unhappy experience with a pair shoddy, pasteboard shoes does not t a bitter enemy to all shoes, but he is ca ful thereafter to avoid the brand that h displeased him. Yet we find it quite usual thing to upbraid newspapers in ge eral for the failing of some one pap Public speakers are much given to th And even so astute a writer as M Seitz, fortified by long experience in newspaper's business office, is now wr ing a series of articles in which he attr utes to the American press in gene the weaknesses he has noted in certa of the papers of Manhattan Island. T danger in such a series of articles lies the fact that many who read them w take them as generally applicable, as t writer says they are, even though new paper workers realize at once that M Seitz, whatever his intention may be, merely describing the more unlove aspects of some New York papers whi are not generally held up as models.

What causes this failure to discrim nate between newspapers? No doubt th similarity of material in the papers h much to do with it. The telegra reports are of necessity similar, but ca be given distinctiveness in handlin Add to them a long gamut of syndica features which too often are so simil to those in other papers as to impre the casual reader as being the same thin and it is not illogical that the impressio will grow that one newspaper is as bad another. Happily, the reader does, time discriminate, but it ought to be mad easier for him to do so.

Is there any way to make it easier fo him to discriminate? One thing tha would be a big help, I am sure, is th more careful search for distinctive fea tures. Homemade features always ar distinctive, just as a well-tailored suit i more distinctive than a ready-made on That does not mean that syndicate fea tures should be dropped entirely, but tha they should be used discriminatingly i we hope to make our readers discriminat ing.

PSYCHO-ANALYSIS OF THE NEWS SHOWS PRESS FOLLOWS HUMAN INSTINCTS

By Dr. GEORGE BARTON CUTTEN

President of Colgate University, Before American Society of Newspaper Editors, Saturday Morning.

THE modern newspaper owes its present character, which is as highly raised as it is severely criticized, to two commonplace factors. It has changed as other industries have changed through the influence of mechanical discoveries and modern business methods. Old journalism, like old business, was personal, humane and local. The editor was most often owner and knew not only his staff intimately but also all the people in town. Now with the owner a corporation, the editors absentee writers, the staff so numerous as not to know each other, and the city dwellers strangers to all, the relations are cold, impersonal and judicial.

But more important than the influence of the time, because more fundamental, the modern newspaper is what it is because it is prepared by human beings and read by human beings. It is human not only in the fact that it makes mistakes in the news, that it prints news which it should not, that it suppresses news which should not, and that its colors its stories, but it shows its humanity in the fact that many of these things are dictated by a kindly heart rather than by a vicious or an irrational head. It must be remembered that the news is subjected to the personal equation of the reporter, and this is as true of the report of the good news of Jesus as of the modern story; our modern reporters would hardly have been more at variance in their reports than the four evangelists. Because they are human they cannot be infallible, nor can they be immune to influence. But newspaper readers are also human, most of them prefer speed and excitement to accuracy, and the public may even demand misrepresentation regarding its own prejudices. If the readers only knew what stories are suppressed they would not object so frequently to those which are presented.

It is with the latter factor, that of the human element in the reader, that I wish to deal, and to endeavor to show you why this reaction is what it is, and how it might be changed for the better of himself and also for the improvement of the future newspaper. It should be said, in order to clear the ground, that the reaction of the modern reader is no different from that it would have been at the dawn of history if he had been presented with a similar paper amid similar surroundings. Incidentally he has not obtained any more power in the last five or ten thousand years—a time too short in his development to note any difference. His interests are the same now as they were when Tut-ankh-amen was encased in his golden basket, or when Moses led the children of Israel away from the inhospitable shores of the kingdom of the Pharoahs. One's interests depends upon his instincts, and this is true whether he be saint or sinner, lay laborer or capitalist.

To know our interests you must know our history—what little you can know. Of all the innumerable years of man's history the only part which nature has considered worth recording is that which is written in the indelible pages of our natures in the form of instincts, together with a few selected pages in the rocks of the earth and in the tissues of the body. Even if it is a small amount, or because it is a small amount, is is correspondently difficult to erase, and the instincts color every thought and influence every action.

But what has this to do with the reaction of the modern man to the modern newspaper? Everything, and a few examples will show this clearly. The editorial, upon which the editor has expended so much time and thought, and which he is sure contains the last word on the subject and should move the whole world, is not even read by most of the newspaper readers. The more exhaustive and thoughtful it is the less likely it is to be read by even those who admit that they do sometimes commit the indiscretion of glancing at the editorial page. To entice the wary the editorials have to be short and spicy—and I admit I miss the editorials of the New York Sun of thirty years ago more than anything else in modern newspaperdom. We are told that editorials occupy only one-sixth the space they formerly did and yet, only one person in ten ever reads them.

Why is that? The answer to the first part of the question is that there is even less demand for editorials than formerly because newspaper reading has now spread so extensively that not only the thoughtful but those who think little read the papers, and the reason why so few read the editorials now and in fact have ever done so, is that thinking is a very late development in the race and we have not yet become adapted to it. The dissemination of news by means of the camp or village gossip must be very old, and the more exciting the tale of battle or chase, the more eagerly it would be received, for then it was a matter of life and death to the recipient. The art of thinking, however, still wearies us, and only a selected portion of the race is capable of any sustained thinking on any subject.

What some people honor by the designation of thinking is only a rearrangement of their prejudices.

To expect men and women who have never done any thinking to read and follow an argument on the merits of a certain supreme court decision is putting more of a burden upon human achievement than it is prepared to sustain. Remember also that reading is likewise a late development and while discussions over the back fence may inspire some semblance of thinking, reading a paper complicates the process so as to make the task impossible for the many. Both to read and think simultaneously is more difficult for some than the task of the one-armed man trying to handle a wheelbarrow on a busy morning. Understanding, then, the late development and consequent difficulty of thinking we can understand the handicap under which the editorial stands as compared with the news item and can govern ourselves accordingly.

It is probable that sight developed before hearing, and that we comprehend scenes more easily and more quickly than we do speaking of any kind. It is also certain that we learned to talk long before we learned to read, so that those of low intellectual ability understand what they hear better than what they read. It therefore follows that scenes are more easily comprehended than reading. You can then readily see the reason for the rapid development and popularity of the picture newspaper, as shown in the wonderful circulation attained by such papers as the Daily News of New York and the departure of some of the more conservative papers in publishing midweek and Sunday pictorial supplements. A large supply of pictures appeals to one of the earliest experiences of the race. Short, easily comprehended items of reading do not overburden the faculties which have developed later and have not become so well established.

Some one has said that the public "wants endless square yards of comic strips, of neolithic execution, and of cro-magnon morality." Very true; but this is simply another way of saying that the people generally demand primitive reactions. If the public demands neolithic executions and cro-magnon morality it as strongly insists upon cave-man humor. Wit is a characteristic of an older nation, and flourishes among more intellectual and cultured people. America has abounded in humorists, but wits have been rare. Humor may be portrayed in pictures, wit, never. Humor is primitive, wit a late product. So we have the comic strips dealing with something which most nearly approaches humor, but of a very low order.

As civilization demands a certain amount of reason and other intellectual processes, humor, especially primitive humor, is a release from these severe and pressing demands, and we find such a release pleasurable. It usually makes it appeal at the expense of certain well known persons and certain institutions of society which demand repression, such as sex; and the amount of release from the rigors of these institutions measures the amount of pleasure given. As the institutions differ in various countries, so the humor of different nations may not be comprehended or enjoyed by others.

The drawings connected with these comic strips are such as appeals to the primitive in man. Real art is a late development and can only be appreciated, if at all, by those specially trained. To take untrained men into the Metropolitan Museum of Fine Arts and expect them to get pleasure out of the artistry there displayed, as distinguished from an occasional interest in the subject portrayed, is the old story of the pearls and the swine. They simply do not know what you are talking about. The comic strip with its rude handiwork and characteristics they do understand and appreciate.

Our interests are always along the line of our instincts. It is not possible for me in a short space of time to discuss all the instincts and consequently all the interests but a brief mention of a few of the most prominent ones will suffice to explain my point. Take such an instinct as that of sex. For the preservation of the species it must of necessity always have been strong, and sex matters have always been of interest, whether at the sewing circle or the barber shop. The press is being severely censured for exploiting this kind of news today.

Undoubtedly there has been an increase in the discussion of sex matters, but whether this is due to the encouragement of the press, or, to the contrary, that the publishing of such news is due to the frankness with which such matters are commonly discussed in comparison with a generation ago is a debated question. Probably there is truth in both claims.

On account of this sex interest, the newspaper can always find readers for news of weddings, elopements, divorces, breach of promise suits, and more irregular sexual experiences. The editor is sorely tried, I know, to decide where to draw the line. He can hardly hide behind the declaration of irresponsibility which always seemed to me unworthy of a patron saint like Dana, "I have felt that whatever the Divine Providence permitted to occur I was not too proud to report."

An editor who follows Article VII of the Canons of Journalism as formulated in 1923 which deals with the subject of decency will be sure to protect the home.

Or consider, if you will, the instinct of pugnacity, ingrained in the race for the furtherance of self-protection. A recent investigator came to the conclusion that the kind of a storm most likely to find a place on the first page of a modern newspaper is one of "a personal fight between well identified antagonists which involved an element of surprise." It might be a man fighting for his life while pinned down by a rock in a cave and others fighting against great odds to rescue him, it might be Bryan and Darrow wasting their time in pugnacious gestures in Tennessee, it might be a woman fighting for her child in a court, or a politician fighting for the spoils of office in city, state, or nation; so long as the tang of battle is in it, human beings must be interested in it.

Take the instinct of escape with its accompanying emotion of fear. This we find prominent in dictating our interests.

Wm. H. Rankin, of the Wm. H. Rankin Co., advertising agents of New York and Chicago, accompanied by his sons Wm. H. Jr. and Robert H., spent a winter vacation at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida.

News of earthquakes or other natural disasters, famine, fire, criminals, poverty, and coal strike, if not too remote from us, inspire us with fear and an impulse to escape. All sorts of calamity news comes under this heading, and events which imply veiled threats or warnings are always most attractive reading.

The instinct of gregariousness is prominent in the human mind and plays no small part in making a certain class of newspaper stories interesting. Patriotism, or what passes for such, is a good example. Anything which permits the reader to identify himself with a certain class, especially if that class is being considerably emphasized or singled out, shows how deep seated the instinct really is. The newspapers themselves find this instinct one which cannot be ignored for they are always identifying themselves with certain popular causes and proclaiming from the house tops that the voice of the people is the voice of God. Unfortunately our gregariousness has not the wide outlook that the older people possess and is most likely to be self-centered. Foreign news occupies 7 per cent of our news space compared with 23 per cent for England, 30 per cent for France, and 35 per cent for Germany.

Now, it is seldom that any story appeals solely to one instinct, but it is correspondingly stronger when appealing to more. A divorce trial may be interesting, but when a fight for the children is added it is more attractive. Crime, which occupies 10 per cent of the news space of the modern newspapers compared with 1 per cent for education, is of the mixed instinctive character. It includes a fight, at least between the man and organized society, it arouses the instinct of escape with the emotion of fear, it stimulates the instinct of gregariousness, and probably the details include items or references which stimulate others of the many human instincts which I have not had time to enumerate. Through the well-known law of compensation the reading of stories of crime inject into the somewhat prosaic life of many men the vicarious sense of being bloody, lustful, or ingenious scoundrels, which they have never outgrown since the youthful days when they dreamed of being a Jesse James or at least a Buffalo Bill. Stories such as these told in the drabbest way are interesting but when illumined in the jaundiced hues which a certain portion of the modern press has so well learned to paint, it has a most stimulating effect upon those who are not used to controlling their instincts by rational process.

Here it is well to state that at times the rational processes are unequal to controlling the instincts of any of us.

It is probably unnecessary for me to say anything further in explanation of or in illustration of our interests, for newspapermen know the fact of certain interests even if some do not know the why of them, and the fact is the practical point. I should be derelict in my duty as well as in my opportunity if I left the matter here and did not proceed to a more constructive part of a program which I hope will prove not only interesting but profitable. There is a primary reaction to all instincts, and in animals this is sometimes the only one, but not always. In human bengs there seem to be secondary or even tertiary reactions to instincts, so that if the primary method of reaction is blocked, then other forms take their place.

It is because of this fact that, as an educator, I trust I may be able to show you the method of using the appeal whic must be made to instincts to uplift rather than to debase, to enrich rather than to impoverish your readers. Recently we have come upon a new term, but, as is frequently the case with new terms, simply expressing a well known idea. The term to which I refer is "sublimation." By this we mean that the primary expression of an instinct is blocked, or as we now say "suppressed," and a new outlet of a more desirable character is found for the energy. Old Thomas Chalmers expressed the same idea in his famous sermon on "The Expulsive Power of a New Affection." Perhaps no better example could be given than that of sex, which we recognize as one of the strongest and most difficult to divert. If we call this "the creative instinct" instead of the sexual, we can get some inkling of how it can be sublimated, i.e., refined or purified. With the suppression of primary reactions to the sexual instinct, stories of artistic creation such as making good pictures and writing great stories, or of construction such as of great buildings or bridges and similar works of a creative character are most likely to provide a substitute for sexual stories. Although the primitive man asserts himself and prefers stories of primary expression, advance must come by the sublimation through repression and education.

The pugnacious instinct shows its primary reactions in the hand-to-hand encounter of two burly antagonists—stories of fist fights always attract especially if between well known antagonists, but we cannot afford as educators to leave this instinct enslaved to such reactions. Stories of encounters against vice, and disease, and lawlessness, are also attractive, and we can substitute the one for the other.

I need hardly take your time to mention other forms of sublimations of well known instincts, but they are innumerable. The press of this country has recognized its responsibility to some extent, but its conscience is not yet equal to its power. We cannot expect that the hands of the clock shall be reversed, and we must recognize that the syndication of news, the standardization of news through the great news agencies, and the speed of news gathering through modern devices are here as permanent factors, but with these news ideas there must come new ideals. Even with the wide spread criminality of the nation it is not necessary to give 10 per cent of the news space to crime. Criminal news is too suggestive and breeds more crime. Crime must be reported but not emphasized; sex matters are most important human relations and need to be reported, but need not be emphasized; fights seem to be important, to promoters at least, and must be reported but not emphasized. All these things are allowable and yet I show you a more excellent way. "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise," emphasize these things.

There are some people who think of newspapers as Tom Reed thought of politicians when he said, "An honest politician is one who stays bought"; I do not believe that. One of the highest paid men in the newspaper world is credited with saying that "a newspaper cannot live by virtue alone"—a half truth. It is more true to say that "a newspaper cannot live without virtue and plenty of it." I recognize that men generally are good and law abiding and kind and as Josh Billings said, "Being good ain't news" because it is the usual. But people are interested in good deeds as well as in bad ones, in kind acts as well as in criminal ones, in virtue as well as in vice. The example of what the New York Times is doing with the neediest cases at Christmas times, as well as many other examples which might be quoted, shows how people can be led into virtuous as well as vicious paths.

There are four things which put a great responsibility on the newspaper of today. They are:

1. It is the greatest and most powerful educational factor we have.
2. The guarantees of freedom of the press contained in the constitution place it particularly on its honor.
3. The growing disinclination of judges and juries to convict newspapers for libel gives it greater license and independence.
4. The added amount of leisure which is being thrust upon the general public gives people time to read, and they naturally turn first to the newspapers, and this is as far as the majority ever get. The reading of newspapers is an acquired taste, and a taste for reading helpful things can also be acquired. A modern newspaper must have honor as well as enterprise, convictions as well as courage, and a willingness to make financial sacrifice for the right rather than to profit through the wrong. People are looking to their leaders today and responding to the right kind of leadership, and no other institution has the opportunity which is vouchsafed to the modern newspaper.

THE POLITICAL JOB OF THE OLD WORLD NEWSPAPER PRESS

By WILMOTT HARSANT LEWIS

Washington Correspondent London Times, Before American Society of Newspaper Editors, on Friday.

WHAT we have to deal with, so far as I understand my subject, are the journals produced for the consumption of that section of the earth's population which is loosely described as civilized. And of these journals, I imagine it can be safely said that no other of man's many inventions can compare with them in rank, intensity or continuity of their influence. It is because of this influence that it has been pointed out that the position of the press is the most unsolvable problem of democracy. I think it was Graham Wallace who first said that, as long as his newspapers pay and the telephone from his house to the editorial office is in working order, the owner of a group of papers has more absolute irresponsibility in the use of great power than any other living man. If he is to use his power in the way of help to the community, he must aim at two virtues—veracity and seriousness—that is to say, the more obvious virtue of saying not only what he believes but the less obvious virtue of taking the trouble to secure that this belief is well-founded. But nothing in his position, nothing in the position of the owner of the group of papers as I have known him in Europe, nothing in his position or in the qualities necessary to reach that position encourages either of these virtues, whether of veracity or of seriousness. The anonymous writers whom he has to carry out his orders have neither the personal independence of the artist nor the public responsibility of the expert. This is a generalization and takes, of course, account of many and brilliant exceptions, but I submit without cynicism and yet in genuine desire to be truthful that that is a round and not too unacceptable statement of the position of a great majority of the men who as I say, are employed to carry out the orders of the proprietors of the great groups of papers.

And if we have in this a hint of the sort of way to approach the subject, we discover that there are two factors in this amazing influence which the newspaper exerts upon the community which we can with advantage consider: First, (I am speaking definitely of the foreign newspaper and situation abroad) the proprietor, and second, the working newspaper men working under that proprietor. And here once again, it seems to me, for purposes of clarity, we have to divide the foreign press more or less into two groups: An English group and a non-English group—a situation more especial to England because next always to the United States, England has seen the most considerable development of publicity in the sense of advertising, and accordingly in England, more generally and notably than on the Continent, the individual newspaper or groups of newspapers have acquired great economic strength and the ability to do things, as it were, in a large way.

I remember, if I might digress into personal reminiscences, a man telling Northcliffe of the purchase by John Smith of a newspaper and that John Smith was proceeding to cut down the overhead in a variety of ways to reduce the running expenses of the paper. Northcliffe said, "He might as well sell it again for what he can get."

"Why?" asked the man.

"Because the business of successful newspaper publishing is a business of reckless expenditure."

From his point of view, the phrase is illustrative and good. His idea of the newspaper publication was to fix as keenly as he could upon something which he assumed the public wanted and to spare no expense in securing it. That is not to say that the able accountants under his employ could not reduce expenses other directions but where something v indicated as being worthwhile from public point of view, Northcliffe's pol was a policy of reckless expenditure.

We have in the English paper, as d tinct from the Continental, enjoyed to such a degree as in the United State exceptional economic strength. This part is based on another fact, for in small and homogeneous country we ha the possibility of what we call natio circulation. There was a time, I credibly informed, when the circulation the Daily Mail had reached 1,750,000 a I was equally credibly informed that that figure, the expenses of publicati were so far beyond what was recovera from the advertiser—the advertiser already paying as much as possible—t the policy then was to reduce the circu tion of the paper.

You take to begin with then, a certa propensity toward publicity, exceptio to England as against the Continent, p the possibility of national circulatio You place in the hand of the newspape very considerable power. Now t power has been realized by a number men and that power has been grasped f purposes which in all frankness and fa ness one can describe as purposes alien those with which the newspaper shou be associated. The proprietor of a gre group of newspapers tends to become some sort of way a politician. His po tion should be that of a middle man b tween the Government and the publ Personal ambition being what it is, t tendency is that he should use that po tion—the control of the large new papers with international circulation— support ends which are more person than public.

Northcliffe during his life, while was in some ways an arch offender in th direction, nevertheless was very proud remember that he was a practical new paper man and it is only fair to assun that a man whose training has been in t newspaper field would use the lar power which comes to him for purpos more public than personal.

Indeed he at one time produced pamphlet in which he pointed out that t British press was passing into the han of too many men who were mere mi lionaires, too many men who were usin this new economic device only remotel for public good. Here was a commodit which they had to sell. The commodit which we sell is news. The by-produ of that commodity is advertising. Th two constitute an economic somethin which in the hands of your mere millio aire as Northcliffe described him, can b put to uses apart from the public interes

There is specifically in England th dangerous tendency toward the accumula tion in individual hands of large number of publications—a tendency toward th irresponsible use of power which is thu accumulated in individual hands.

Now if it could be assumed that me employed under these conditions wer completely subservient, the conditio would be very bad. But curiously enough there has been in my personal experienc in British journalism, a steady in crease, a steady growth in the economi independence of the individual newspape men. Nobody contributed to that s much as Northcliffe himself, the arc monopolizer of newspapers who died th proprietor of more than 70 publication of various sorts. Northcliffe worked o the theory of a fair day's wage for a fai day's work.

My first connection with newspape work was as a reporter at 25 shillings a week, which, translated into terms o dollars, was $5.00, for which I worke

TRADE BOARD WON'T DISMISS AD CHARGES

ction of Commission at Secret Session Jan. 20 Also Formally Issues Amended Complaint Citing Six-Point League and A. N. P. A. as Parties

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

ASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—The Fed-eral Trade Commission has unan-ously overruled the motion to dismiss t original complaint against leading wspaper and advertising organizations lt they are engaged in a conspiracy to ntrol national advertising upon the is of a "standard trade differential fifteen per cent."

The commission has also issued an ended complaint which includes the erican Newspaper Publishers Asso-tion and the Six Point League with American Association of Advertising encies, the American Press Associa-n, and the Southern Newspaper Pub-iers' Association in the original plaint which was dated December 1924.

The motion for dismissal was made counsel for the newspaper and ad-tising organizations at a hearing con-ted by the commission in November which was reported fully in EDITOR & PUBLISHER the motion was made ncipally upon the contention that the mission had no jurisdiction in the e as advertising involved intra-state not inter-state control.

The decision of the commission that loes possess interstate control of the ertising business, where restraint of le is proven, was reached at an execu-session held late Wednesday after-on.

In accordance with the rules adopted the commission a year ago that no nouncements of its decisions should made until a case is disposed of lly, no publicity was given to its on.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER was informed ficially today that such action had been en, although the decision of the com-sion was not reduced to writing.

t was explained by members of the mission that the next step would for the newspaper publishing and ad-tising organizations named in the nded complaint to file answers.

Upon receipt of the answers, another ring will be held and the commission then proceed to act finally in the r.

How soon the case may be concluded problematical. Considerable time may ase, under the procedure laid down the commission before all phases of cases are disposed of finally.

Besides the Six Point League, the nded complaint names as respondents: ph F. Finley, F. P. Motz, W. D. rd, and M. P. Linn as respectively s president, vice-president, treasurer secretary, and John Budd, H. G. sted, A. W. Howland, M. D. Hunton, R. Katz, W. H. Lawrence, Ralph Mulligan, John O'Mara, F. St. John nards and Geo. A. Riley as members the executive committee. It is also ged in the amended complaint that "said committee conducts and ad-isters and aids aforesaid officers in ducting and administering the activ-and affairs of said league. The bers of said league are more than n number, which number varies from to time by the dropping out of the and the addition of new members, hat it is impracticable at any given to name as parties and bring before commission herein each and all the bers of said League without mani-inconvenience and delay, wherefore, officers of said league hereinabove ed, as parties respondent individually as such officers are now here made ies respondent as representing each all the members of said league."

attacking the Six Point League amended complaint also alleges, ds frequent meetings with the news-r committee of the respondent cy association: discusses and co-ates with the agency association on natter of the elimination of rebating the standard trade differential; assed a resolution that the members of the Six Point League recommend to the newspapers for which they re-spectively act as special representatives, that such newspapers adhere to the principles of agency recognition estab-lished by the respondent American News-paper Publishers Association; adopted the necessary steps so that any adver-tising agency which has not applied for such recognition receives no considera-tion by the members of the league; em-ploys a recognition committee to effect the said results;

"Insists that the advertising agencies with which members of the said league do business, shall not cut, or rebate from the said standard agency differential in favor of any advertiser;

"Furnishes to the agency association a list of the newspapers which they represent, stating the policy followed by each such newspaper as to publishing the advertising of certain named direct advertisers, and as to receiving business from a named unrecognized agency and furnish also information concerning agencies known as 'house agencies,' con-trolled, confidentially or otherwise, by direct advertisers for use by the said agency association in carrying out the activities of the agency association in this paragraph above outlined;

"Has sought and obtained the co-operation of the agency association to the end that the standard trade differ-ential be allowed only to such agencies as are recognized by the Newspaper Publishers Association, and that news-papers which refused to grant concessions from the aforesaid gross rates to direct advertisers should receive from the agencies a preference in the placing of national advertising.

"Has assisted the agency association in the preparation of the lists of news-paper publishers hereinbefore in this paragraph described.

"Uses other cooperative means to carry out and effectuate said combination and its purposes."

Charges against the American News-paper Publishers Association, follow:

"(A) In annual convention, endorses the activities of the advertising agencies and passes resolutions approving and endorsing the aforesaid agency system of remuneration, opposing any modifica-tion or alteration therein, and declaring that the splitting of the standard agency differential directly or indirectly by any agency is immoral and should not be permitted to continue.

"(B) Issues a series of bulletins to its members carrying propaganda against direct advertisers who place, and against newspaper publishers who receive, direct advertising at less than gross rates, and recounting and approving action taken by individuals and organizations for the maintenance of the aforesaid standard trade differential, and agency commission system, mentioning in said bulletins the names of certain direct advertisers.

"(C) Makes, subject to modification by it from time to time, a list of agencies known as agencies recognized by the said American Newspaper Publishers Association, for the purpose, among other purposes, of aiding in carrying out the aforesaid combination and con-spiracy, and for the purpose of limiting to the agencies so recognized, the benefit of the net rates and the standard trade differential.

"(D) Sends its list of recognized agencies to other respondents for their information, use and guidance, and furnishes said list to its members for their use, to the end that the said com-bination and conspiracy and its objects be carried into effect.

"(E) Cooperates closely with other respondents and their committees for the purpose of maintaining the said standard trade differential and for preventing di-rect advertising at less than gross rates.

"(F) Cooperates with the agency association in securing information as to direct advertisers and as to said de-scribed house agencies, in order that direct advertisers shall not directly or indirectly obtain less than gross rates, and in order that house agencies shall be eliminated from competition.

"(G) Notifies its member newspapers of national advertisers who try to obtain less than gross rates, so that the mem-ber newspapers may be induced to refuse to grant less than gross rates and may be induced to adhere to the standard trade differential and to eliminate house agencies from competition.

"(H) Uses other cooperative means to carry out and effectuate said combina-tion and conspiracy and its above de-scribed purposes."

EARLY PLANS LAID FOR PHILADELPHIA MEET

Dr. Cadman to Deliver Opening Address of A. A. C. W. Convention Next June—H. H. Charles, Com-mittee Chairman, Outlines Program

"Advertising as the Stabilizer of Busi-ness" was selected as the theme of the annual convention of the Associated Ad-vertising Clubs of the World, to be held in Philadelphia next June, it was decided late last week at a meeting of the general program committee in New York. The meeting was attended by H. H. Charles, committee chairman; Rowe Stewart, Phil-adelphia Record; James Wright Brown of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, and W. G. Hil-debrant.

Mr. Charles announced that Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn, had accepted the committee's invitation to open the convention with an inspirational address on "Imagination and Advertising."

"We will present men of prominence from seven fields on this general pro-gram," said Mr. Charles. "These seven are Finance, Industry, Transportation, Agriculture, Manufacturing, Education and Advertising. We hope also to have a woman speaker, as we did at Houston, and have sent an invitation to one of the most promient women in American public life. Invitations are out to men of promi-nence in every one of the other six fields and I hope within the next two weeks to be able to announce acceptances.

"C. Harold Vernon, the honorary in-ternational vice-president of the Associ-ated Advertising Clubs of the World, and one of the most prominent men in Brit-ish advertising circles, accepted our invi-tation of a place on the general program when he was in the country a few weeks ago, as announced at that time."

"We want everybody who goes to the convention to feel that he or she will get more out of it than can be determined by the time and the mere dollars they spent on the trip and stay," Mr. Stewart said. "Careful thought is back of the prepara-tion and caution will be observed to pre-clude conflict between the work of the convention and diversion."

Chicago Society Woman Asks $500,000 from Butterick Company

A $500,000 libel suit was filed in the Circuit Court at St. Louis Friday, Jan. 15, against the Butterick Publishing Com-pany by Mrs. Ruth Wilk Plamondon, Chicago society matron, who alleges that her photograph was used in the Butterick Quarterly to advertise a booklet telling how to win a husband by psychological methods.

The petition alleges that a full length bridal photograph of Mrs. Plamondon, advertising the publications of Psycholo-gy Press, St. Louis, was published in the latest issue of the Quarterly under the caption, "How I Won the Man I Love."

Then, followed, according to the peti-tion, the substance of a letter which set forth the details of how "a demure little wren of a girl was changed overnight into an attractive bird of paradise woman," and after being neglected by her young men acquaintances suddenly became the centre of attraction and in a few weeks, "the radiant bride of the man she had loved in vain for years."

Mrs. Plamondon denies having written such a letter. She is the daughter of F. L. Wilk, vice-president of the Union Trust Bank of Chicago, and was married in 1922 to A. D. Plamondon, Jr.

Declaring that she has been subject to ridicule and embarrassment because of the advertisement, Mrs. Plamondon asks for $350,000 actual and $150,000 punitive damages.

SHERMAN BOWLES BUYS SPRINGFIELD UNION

General Manager of Republican Ac-quires Majority Control — Union Continues Under Direction of M. S. Sherman

Sherman H. Bowles, general manager of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, has acquired majority control of the Springfield Union, sole competitor of the Republican in the city. Plans for the future operation of the Union have not been completed. The paper is continu-ing publication under the editorship of M. S. Sherman, present editor, with no change in its policies.

Announcement of the purchase came as a distinct surprise. It had been reported in newspaper circles that majority con-trol of the Union had been purchased by Maj. Frank Knox, publisher of the Man-chester (N. H.) Union and Leader.

Mr. Bowles announced his purchase in a two-column signed box on the front page of all editions of both papers. The Springfield Daily News, which is affiliated with the Republican, has also purchased the Westfield Journal, a small daily cir-culating in Westfield in competition with the News.

A temporary agreement has been reached with the Typographical Union whereby advertisements for insertion in both Union and Republican are being set on a 50-50 basis, half being set in the Union's composing room and mats taken and sent to the Republican, while a simi-lar procedure is being followed in the Republican's composing room. It is un-derstood that a consolidation of the Sun-day editions of both papers is contem-plated shortly.

The Springfield Union was founded as an evening paper in January, 1864, by Edmund Anthony of New Bedford, who also founded the New Bedford Standard and the Taunton Gazette. The morning issue of the paper began in July, 1892, and the Sunday issue in July, 1894. Jo-seph L. Shipley took control of the paper in 1882 and it passed into the control of the Union Newspaper Company in 1892. George von L. Meyer obtained control about three years ago. The price paid by Mr. Bowles for the paper has not been made public.

BOOSTING LOCAL DEALERS TO BUILD A PRODUC

Ajax Rubber Company by Advertising and Protection Seeks to Make Retail Agents Outstanding Their Communities—Expense Met Through Profit Sharing Franchise

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

This is the second article in a series of interviews with advertising managers of national firms discussing: "What is the present advertising trend?"

H. W. Roland, sales promotion and advertising manager of the Ajax Rubber Company, Inc., sees his field turning towards closer co-operation with local retail dealers.

"We are trying to insure permanent service for ourselves," he says, "by offering our local dealers real advertising help and sales service."

DURING the past year the Ajax Rubber Company, Inc., at its own expense set out some 5,000 road signs advertising local dealers specializing in Ajax tires. No novelty, of course, attaches to that particular advertising stunt; but what was decidedly new was that each one of the road signs carried the name of the local dealer first and more prominently displayed than the name of the tire. Thus these signs became significant symbols of the comparatively new policy of the firm, a policy which, in seeking to build prestige for a national product through boosting and aiding the local retail agent, clearly examples a current advertising trend.

Local newspapers tell readers the Ajax dealer is there to serve community.

This idea is being carried through all Ajax advertising and salesmanship, and is plainly evidenced in the 1926 newspaper copy, written with a view to making the local dealer an outstanding and recognized tire authority in his community. Advertising expense is met through a novel profit-sharing franchise plan, through which a certain percentage of net purchases is set aside by the company for local promotion purposes. The account is handled by George Harrison Phelps.

"Here's the point," said H. W. Roland, the Ajax sales promotion and advertising manager, in an interview this week: "There are some 75,000 to 100,000 tire dealers in the country today, and, if you are an automobile driver needing a tire and have been influenced by the so-called institutional national advertising, it is going to require no little persistence on your part to seek out the man who specializes in selling the make you have seen extolled in the magazines. If, however, by local concentrated advertising we make the Ajax dealer outstanding in your community it seems to follow naturally that, provided the product is good, you will gravitate towards that dealer.

"And if we protect that dealer and refuse to put our tires in the barber shop around the corner, if we zone him and refuse to sell to others in his zone, in other words if we co-operate fully with him, we believe that a permanent dealer organization will follow."

The same idea is expressed in different words in the Ajax portfolio, carried by the firm's salesmen, reading as follows, under the headline "Ajax Picture a Complete Picture; Advertising Centered on Dealer":

"Ajax prospers only if its dealers prosper. If Ajax advertising is built around its dealers, its dealers will prosper. All Ajax advertising is centered around its dealers. Ajax dealers are thought of first. Ajax is thought of second. The product is subordinated to the man who sells it. That is as it should be. For it is upon the responsibility of the dealer that tires are bought. Unless tire users believe in the tire merchant, they do not believe in the product he sells."

Then, under the separate heading "Not How to Sell Tires to Dealer, But How to Sell Tires for Dealer," the portfolio's statement of policy continues:

"Ajax knows that if it helps you to sell Ajax tires at a profit you will continue to buy Ajax tires. Therefore, our entire thought is to aid you to sell at a profit the tires you have bought from us. Such is the basis for a prosperous, profit-making, permanent dealer organization. That is the only kind of dealer organization worth while. Our entire program, placed before you in this book, is built upon your need, and the services of our advertising department and our salesmen are at your disposal to aid you to sell tires."

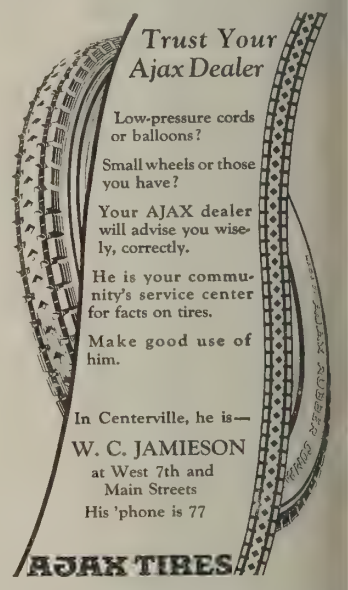
The 1926 portfolio is now being completed and will be in the hands of Ajax salesmen the latter part of this month. In addition to road signs, window displays, stationery, blotters and such promotion matter, the book suggests two special newspaper advertising campaigns, designed to feature the local dealer rather than the product he sells.

"We believe that the reputation of a dealer in his community has great influence on sales," Mr. Roland said. "So many tire dealers are here today and gone tomorrow. The mortality among tire dealers has been terrific. By making Ajax dealers stand out in their communities as tire experts, we believe Ajax sales will benefit, and we will be provided with a really permanent dealer organization.

"We are not trying to kid the dealer. He has been kidded by experts for years. We are trying to get away from the beaten rut, and constantly preach permanent relationship through individual service."

Thus it is that after the advertising program has been arranged in portfolio form, it is scheduled only according to the requests of the local dealer. The advertising appropriation is expended only when the Ajax district managers in consultation with community dealers are convinced that the advertising suits a particular need.

The 1926 portfolio when completed will present 10 pieces of copy to be placed in newspapers, if that media is sold locally to the Ajax dealer. As was the case last year the copy is built around the dealer. In 1925 some of the newspaper advertising headlines were: "Trust Your Ajax Dealer"; "Your Ajax Dealer Knows"; "His Protection and Yours"; "Your Interests Are His," and "Serving His Community."



Text of the first 1926 newspaper advertisement already prepared reads as follows, under the caption "Why He Sells Ajax":

Mr. Roland said this week, "We did the biggest business in 1925 in the history of the company, and we have we think established a permanency in our dealer relations we didn't believe possible two years ago."

The Profit Sharing Franchise through which the money is set up for Ajax dealers advertising purposes became a part of the Ajax sales plan in 1923. The franchise, signed up on a yea basis, makes it possible for the A dealer to obtain graduated cash divide as his volume of sales increases. Th cash dividend checks are sent out as dealer reaches the stipulated step in franchise. One clause of the franch provides that a percentage of the t net sales be set up as an advertis credit of the dealer's account.

The Ajax sales map is divided w 12 districts, each of which are split into 22 branches, furnishing direct f tory outlets for Ajax products.

Mr. Roland was appointed to his pr ent position in April 1924. He is former newspaper man, having had years' experience in the editorial depa ment of the Detroit News. He start newspaper work in Chicago as a report for the City News Association of th city, and also worked on small dail in the middle west. He started on t desk of the News and was subsequen made assistant state editor, then te graph editor, make-up editor, Sund editor and news editor. During the w he spent a while as a Washington c respondent for the same paper.

Ajax copy writers see to it, that local dealers share in the good-will advertising creates.

Perhaps because of his editorial expe ence, Mr. Roland is emphatic in his o position to the free space grafting a vertiser. He had read the articles EDITOR & PUBLISHER presenting t views of Albert R. Erskine, president the Studebaker Corporation, and Walt P. Chrysler, president, and C. E. Scharps, advertising manager of t Chrysler Sales Corporation, against t present free publicity system, and agre with them.

"We don't make any attempt to g free space in the newspapers," he d clared.

"As make-up man on various new papers, I have seen perfectly good ne 'slopped' to the extent of galley aft galley because of 'B. O. Musts.' A 'B. O. Musts' always are easily identifie There is rarely real news contained such publicity. An examination of t automotive sections and theatre sectio of the big city papers is sufficient to wa rant such a charge, I believe.

"And honestly, isn't it a reflection up the good sense of the readers to ask the to swallow such guff as being sufficient important and authentic to justify t space given?

"The days of the bigger the year schedule, the greater the amount of fr space, should be done away with for a time. It will help the newspaper to cr ate a new respect for the contents its editorial columns."

n the newspaper shop we were always rested in the yarns of tramp printers drifting reporters, but the wild mes, ideas and stunts of strolling adising men made them stars.

nother soldier of chance who picked a good living promoted contests for l stores on the back of laundry slips. scheme advertised the stores, and le people take more work to the laun- in order to collect the slips.

ack in the days of lotteries, when ple were forced to make a purchase do some particular thing, in order to in on the prize money, these scheme kers cleaned up and then moved along.

he street corner sign solicitor was the runner of the old time directory soli- rs.

he display columns of many news- ers were made up of "cards" and the le page was nothing more than a local ictory. Very little revenue was re- ed for these small spaces, but what te they did bring in they brought in ularly.

hen there was the class of spasmodic, al and occasional solicitors who put ictory boards in barber shops, bar- ms and in railway stations.

very line of industry had its little trade ictory, and any manufacturer or jobber hat business was expected to support directory.

has always seemed to me that this the starting point, the place where ny solicitors were grafted into the ad- ising game.

most certainly was a good, hard train- field when a chap learned the trick of cocting a story for a directory adver- ng, he learned the first essentials of essful soliciting.

he could push over some of those l-shelled, no-advertising birds he won spurs.

ack in the days when they just didn't eve in advertising; when advertising simply throwing money away, or giv- it to charity, the line of talk to close eal had to be linked up with all the ks of "come-on" salesmanship.

it wasn't about the best brand of smanship going then it was just plain ging.

Chapter XXI

Clever Boys in the Game

THER early advertising adventurers which I have catalogued in my scrap , were the County Fair Rubes or nival Workers. They dressed up in ube outfit or fancy costumes and ed bills or carried a sandwich sign. re is a fellow who walks on stilts, still plays this game. I saw him on l street in New York recently.

here were the Sandwich Men, whose s were the original bill boards. This the first example of the much talked t animated advertising. There were ile brained fellows who flew kites car- g advertising banners, the floating s agents who wrote flowery, flowing about business men, barkeepers, ers and livery stable owners. These es were run in the local papers at ation rates per line, while the press t charged all the vanity of the vic- would stand for, netting him about 0 percent.

me of these stories, headed, "Our t Prominent and Respected Citizens," later changed slightly with an obituary headline. Then the newspaper made no charge.

There were many resourceful and adventurous advertising roamers, who brought in schemes new and different. But on the other hand many clever fellows carried the same old brand of bunk and soft soap which the average small and large town advertiser fell for. I always associate the time of this great advertising spree with music. It was about the time that that old popular song "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight" was all the rage.

I have helped sing this song with these adventurers when they collected and treated. There were other songs such as "Down Went McGinty," "Under the Bamboo Tree," "I've Got a Girl in Baltimore" and "Ta-ra-la-de-boom-de-day."

To me this was the musical period in advertising because these clever birds were always collecting, celebrating and singing. I'm not kicking or knocking the old sports. It was great fun singing with them, and on them. They were great spenders, "Easy come, easy go," as the old saying goes. These were the men who put the "sing" in advertising.

These fellows could spend hours telling of the clever advertising schemes they had worked. And the names of towns fell from their silver tongues with the ease of men who have seen and done things. They had traveled afar, seen much, knew human nature; especially the weakness of advertisers for praise and for getting hold of some scheme to fool or entice the wary public. No wonder it has taken so long to convince the public that advertising really pays. In the songster and schemester days the public really paid for advertising.

And so in my unsophisticated youth the advertising men I met lived by their wits; they were fit characters for any soldier of fortune, or soldier of chance drama. My youthful mind caught the vision of keen and clever methods that would catch the eye and open the pocketbook. These schemes were not thought of then as fakes or illegitimate. It was the way of that day.

Matrimonial Bureaus flourished with the saloons. I met the fellows who had run matrimonial bureaus and the advertising artists who painted beautiful signs on saloons mirrors.

An advertising man I remember well carried his factory with him and put out a trade-marked package brand. From the wholesale grocer he would buy a bundle of small cheap paper bags. On these he would have printed in red ink—"Champion Moth Killer." Then followed a strong selling talk on the merits of the contents. He would go to a local drug store, buy several pounds of moth balls at a few cents a pound, grind them up in a coffee grinder. A small amount of the powder was placed in each bag and sold at the bargain price of 25 cents. He only made about a thousand per cent profit.

His idea was that a small amount of some mysterious powder would sell better than a pound of moth balls, which everyone knew about. It did because the package, the name and the selling talk did the work.

He bought other stuff sold in bulk and put it up in small bags and peddled it from door to door. This was in the days before the buying of advertised packages of crackers, other food stuffs, and drugs were popularized through advertising.

There were many advertising men who drifted about introducing electric belts, fountain pens, new and novel things.

They were successful, because both the merchants and the public were interested in anything new, unique and novel. But the name advertising was greatly misused. People got the idea that any such scheme as the letter writing stunt, missing word or letter puzzle, free offers, cash prize contests, and other sensational ideas were advertising. It was something that one took a chance with. It was a gamble, a trick, something uncertain, and something people were suspicious of once they were fooled.

Mail order schemes devised to hook a victim were prevalent, and many suckers were caught. All kinds of remarkable offers were made to give something away free as a reward to the reader who wrote a letter or solved a puzzle. There were plenty of catches, and the people became afraid of free advertised offers.

There was the scheme of clipping obituary notices and sending an advertised pair of spectacles (costing ten cents) and collecting for $1.00. And then relatives, thinking the deceased had ordered them, would pay.

But those days are gone. It was a publicity period when great crimes were committed in the name of advertising; when publicity meant anything that would get money quickly. Get the cash and go after another sucker, was the game played.

Today people know that advertising is the power which stands back of reputations; it is a power that helps humanity live better and strive for higher standards.

Chapter XXII

The Hymn Book Ad Solicitor

THE advertising boys who put things over most quickly in the old days, were the chaps who loved the adventure of the game.

They did not always make a lot of money. Sometimes they cleaned up but just as often they got cleaned.

Well do I remember two clever advertising solicitors I met out West where pickings were not so good. They had visited many towns and cities in the West and Southwest quietly and quickly pulling off their little stunt and departing for new fields. I was never in a town where this scheme was worked, but I have heard them tell of it. It was called the "Church Hymn Book Advertising."

The schemers would visit several churches in a town, look over the hymn books carefully. Where they found the books worn and dilapidated they immediately called on the ministers.

They were good dressers and aimed to present a favorable appearance. The spiel they pulled off was something like this:—

"I have noticed, Reverend Jones, that you are badly in need of hymn books."

"Yes, you are right," the minister would reply. "We certainly should have new hymn books, but with our present indebtedness we cannot possibly afford them. I am very sorry we cannot buy from you."

"I am not here trying to sell you a thing," the schemer would say. "But what would you say if I were to offer to make your church a present of all the new hymn books you required?"

"I would say that you were a public benefactor. You really mean that our church will receive the new hymn books without a cent of cost?"

"Absolutely, now how many will you want?"

Well, anyway it was a different number for each church. After the number had been decided upon the minister would be requested to write a letter to the effect that he would accept so many hundred hymn books as a gift to the church.

The minister usually wrote the letter willingly. When he had enough churches signed up to give him a definite circulation figure the schemer started out to solicit ads from the local stores and business houses.

His line of talk to the merchants was as clever as his talk to the ministers.

"You may spend piles of money for advertising in newspapers, programs and other things," said the schemer, "but I've got a plan of permanent publicity."

"But I'm not going to spend any more money for fool stunts," answered the wary merchant. "I tell you I've thrown away all the money I intend to."

"That's just the trouble," the schemer replied. "You've been wasting money year after year. Now when I come to you with a big money getter, you want to turn me down even before you have heard what my offer is. All I ask is a fair chance to present my proposition. Then take it or leave it."

"All right, go ahead," replied the merchant, "but it won't do you any good."

The schemer never lost time at this point. Once a man agreed to listen to him, he knew he had him as good as landed.

"I have beyond all doubt the greatest advertising medium in existence," explained the schemer. "Here I have letters from four of your own local ministers accepting—so many hundreds, or a thousand—hymn books. These books will be delivered into the pews and there they will remain for years and years.

"Each book will contain 50 pages of advertising. Your ad in that book will be a perpetual advertisement for your store. Think of the value I am offering you. For one cost you get year after year advertising. Did you ever hear of a hymn book being thrown away? No. Not even when it is worn out. Your ad will be read many times a week by people whose minds are in a peaceful state.

"You know that the people who come to church and prayer meetings are the people who read and then believe what they read. It is the right moment to convince people of the truth of your advertising."

While the schemer was laying on his big talk he placed the letters from the ministers before the merchant.

The advertising rates were figured to cover the cost of the hymn books, bought from some cheap mail order house, and the cost of printing the pages of advertisements which were stitched or pasted in the back of the books.

There were plenty of good sound arguments to put back of a scheme of this kind. That it was helping the churches; that the ads were reaching every week the good, substantial, religious people; that the cost per person over a period of years was very low.

The hard job was to sell the first space. But the old time schemers knew how to play their game to win. It was an easy matter to mark pages "Sold" which could later be sold again.

With a few contracts signed by leading merchants, the others flocked in like sheep following a leader.

The old time schemers used a hypnotic flow of money-getting talk. They were real advertising salesmen. They worked on the edge of desperation. There was no such word as fail. They had to make good to eat. The old time scheme advertiser played his cards to win.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

Bernard Ridder—Seeks new fields to conquer.

BERNARD RIDDER, president of the Staats Herold Corporation, New York, is hoping shortly to enter the English language daily newspaper field, he informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week. His first move in that direction failed recently, he said, but he declared he is still actively seeking other opportunities. He was associated with Frank Gannett in an unsuccessful bid for the Chicago Daily News.

The Staats Herold Corporation publishes the New Yorker Staats Zeitung and Herold, sole survivors of nine German language daily publications in New York prior to the war. Mr. Bernard Ridder has been president for the past 10 years. He was elected to succeed his father the late Herman Ridder, who for many years was president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. Other officials of the corporation are Julius Holz, publisher, Felix Arnold, treasurer, and Joseph and Victor Ridder, directors.

"My aim in making the Staats Zeitung Herold is to produce an American newspaper published in the German language," Mr. Ridder said in an interview. "We are, however, Continental to the extent that we do not print either comics or other frivolous features. My ideal for the paper is that of a daily literary magazine, which does not overlook the news.

"We have developed our own news gathering organization and do not duplicate to any great degree the stories appearing in the regular English language dailies. There are some 800 German-American societies in New York and much of our space is devoted to their activities. An index to the tone we try to preserve in the paper is that we give more space to music than all the American language newspapers in New York combined."

Mr. Ridder himself writes for his paper a great deal. For years he conducted a daily column under his own signature. Although the Staats Zeitung Herold has been in the Ridder family some 40 years, the present president did not confine his training to work for that newspaper. When he was graduated from Columbia University in 1903, he spent several years on the staff of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle in the various departments.

The Staats Zeitung Herold was established in New York in 1834 by Oswald Ottendorfer. While in its early days the paper was small in comparison to its present size, the property, according to Mr. Ridder, has always been prosperous. Even during the war no severe set-back was experienced. The publishers received permit No. 1 from the government to continue publication after war was declared.

New York's German population of approximately 850,000, representing 125,000 German families is the basis of the prosperity the paper has enjoyed, Mr. Ridder believes. More than 70,000 of this number, he has estimated, own their homes.

Many newspaper men remember the banquet the late Herman Ridder gave to the American press in February 1902, at the Waldrof Astoria Hotel in New York in honor of Prince Henry of Prussia. More than 2,000 editors and publishers attended.

SEEKS LIBEL LAW REVISION

Virginia Press Prepares Amendment at Farmville Meeting

Revision of the state libel law was one of the chief topics discussed at the mid-winter meeting of the Virginia Press Association at Farmville, Jan. 15-16. The Association is seeking to amend the present law with a provision that 10 days' notice of a pending suit must be given a newspaper in order that a retraction may be printed. Such a provision was drawn up and is now being put in legal form for introduction in the state legislature.

Appointment of a full-time field secretary was another important subject considered, discussion of this matter being led by J. B. Wall, editor of the Farmville Herald. A committee was appointed to study and report on this move at the annual meeting in mid-summer.

Three new members were elected to the Association, L. R. Davis, Bowling Green Caroline Progress, Robert Glass, Lynchburg News, and Mrs. M. M. Lane.

C. L. Weymouth, editor of the Ashland Herald-Progress was named secretary to succeed James C. Latimer, who resigned recently to become field secretary for the Press Congress of the World.

Among the speakers at the meeting were L. E. Pugh, business manager, Newport News Daily Press; W. Y. Morgan, editor, Warsaw Northern Neck News; George Kilpatrick, editor, Lawrenceville Times-Gazette; James C. Latimer; Dr. J. L. Jarman, president, State Teachers College; and W. MacDonald Lee.

Col. W. S. Copeland, editor and publisher of the Newport News Daily Press and president of the association, presided.

SHIP NEWS MEN ELECT

Heinz, of New York American, Heads "Outposts of American Journalism"

Louis Heinz, of the New York American, was elected president of the New York Ship News Reporters Association, at the annual meeting held Jan. 19. Members of the association were once characterized by Lloyd George as "the outposts of American journalism." They go down New York bay to obtain news from incoming ships.

Heinz has been a member of the American's staff for about 22 years. He left this week on a seven weeks' holiday trip to the Holy Land.

Other association officers are Harry Cunningham, New York Evening World, vice-president, John Regan, New York City News Association, secretary, and Martin Petry, New York Evening Post, treasurer.

EDITORIAL PAGE DISCUSSED

"Its Use and Abuse" Theme at North Dakota Press Meeting

"The Editorial Page, Its Uses and Abuses" was to be discussed this week by Winthrop Chamberlain, chief editorial writer of the Minneapolis Journal, addressing the North Dakota Press Association, meeting at Minot, N. D., Jan. 22-23. J. F. Bacon, Grand Forks Herald, is association president.

Other speakers scheduled were: Prof. Roy L. French, School of Journalism, University of North Dakota, on "Proper Front Page Make-Up"; Wayne Peterson Rolla Star, "Advertising Rates"; Hal Davies, president of the North West Editorial Association; James M. Cramer, Marmarth Mail, "Feature Stories"; Ernest A. Frances, Williston Press, "Neighborhood News"; and W. R. Chapel, Mohall Press, "Free Publicity."

A. P. Moore Luncheon Guest

Alexander P. Moore, former Ambassador to Spain, was guest of honor at a luncheon Jan. 14 at the Hamilton Club, Brooklyn, given him by the Brooklyn Daily Eagle in recognition of his hospitality and assistance to members of the Eagle's Old World Tour of 1925. Guests were: John Alden, Harris M. Crist, George Currie, William N. Dykman, George S. Frank, M. Preston Goodfellow, Herbert F. Gunnison, Raymond M. Gunnison, Arthur M. Howe, R. F. R. Huntsman, H. V. Kaltenborn, David McLean, Edwin G. Martin, Edwin P. Maynord, Fremont C. Peck, Cleveland Rodgers, Frederick Boyd Stevenson, Robert V. Titus and Edwin B. Wilson.

The Greatest Newspaper Press In the South

This press, made up of six units and a color press, prints 35,000 copies of THE FLORIDA TIMES-UNION every hour of the press-run.

Over seventeen tons of paper are used to supply the daily circulation.

This circulation, both for city and state, is the largest of any Florida newspaper.

Such facilities, both in printing and distribution, go far towards making this paper the greatest advertising medium in Florida.

Side-Stepping "The Combinations"

Three hundred and forty-five of the largest national advertisers at their annual convention in November, 1925, passed the following resolution by unanimous vote:

"Whereas, the members of the Association of National Advertisers are extensive users of newspaper space and

"Whereas, their use of such space should be determined by scientific study and limited by economical considerations with interest to the elimination of waste, therefore be it—

"Resolved, that the Association of National Advertisers, by vote of its membership in annual convention assembled, expresses itself as unalterably opposed to the practice of newspaper publishers of both evening and morning newspapers of selling these two separate and distinct publications to national advertisers only as one unit; and be it further—

"Resolved, that it seriously objects to the discrimination shown by publishers of such combinations to selling local advertisers either unit of their combination separately, while refusing to sell them to national advertisers."

Advertisers may side-step the combinations in five cities by listing these strong evening newspapers exclusively:

	City Circulation	Total Circulation
Oklahoma News	21,362	37,594
Baltimore Post	109,569	111,196
Fort Worth Press	16,890	17,915
El Paso Post	9,593	10,524
San Diego Sun	15,601	18,572

According to the 1920 census there are 254,137 families in these cities. The recommended newspapers have city circulation sufficient to cover more than 70% of these families—7 out of every 10.

SCHOOL CLASS SCORES ANNUAL BEAT ON STUDENT MURDER MYSTERY

University of Idaho Student "Killed" Regularly for Benefit of Yearling Students, Who Cover Trial—"Facts" the Imagination of E. F. Mason, University Editor

(This is Fifth of a Series of Articles, Interpreting the Work of Journalism Schools to Editors of the Nation.)

ROBERT T. SMITH, University of Idaho student, after a call at the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority house one evening last fall, slipped on the cement steps, struck his head and was killed. His body was discovered by one of the girls the following morning.

He had been killed in the same way in the same place, just a year before. Two years earlier, William Hartley had met the same fate.

Damage suit has been brought by Smith's parents, residents of Boise, but the case never has come to trial. The Theta girls know nothing of the whole affair.

Each accident has been solely the "scoop" of the class in "news writing" at the University of Idaho, Moscow. The "facts" have been produced from the imagination of Edward F. Mason, university editor. And some members of the class, knowing little of news style, have handled the story curiously.

"I believe in throwing them in and letting them swim," says Mr. Mason, although he denies that he's the traditional, hard-boiled city editor—won't admit, indeed, being even partially hard.

But when the class first meets in the fall and eyes him with that strange, half doubtful, half hopeful expectancy with which a new class sizes up an unfamiliar teacher, he tells them promptly that they're reporters for the Moscow Star-Mirror, that they've heard the fire alarm, that they've waited, busy with other duties, until a second alarm, that they've followed the crowd up the hill to the university, that they've seen smoke issuing from the infirmary, that they've found patients in cots on the sidewalk, that they've learned of rescue work by the Lindley hall boys, that one of the boys has been somewhat burned. They interview the nurse, the fire chief, and others; they learn that the fire started in Room 13; that there was a stove in it, but the stove had not been used since last spring. The chief says "cigaret." They are told to write the story.

It sounds simple. But for students who have been trained in every other form of composition except that which starts with its climax—the news story—this assignment proves to be a real problem. When the story is written it is analyzed in class. Then others are given:

Smith is killed on the sorority steps; a mysterious Raymond S. Browne buys options on clay land near Joel; Elsie Patterson is injured in an auto accident on the S. A. E. corner; Smith's parents sue the sorority and the city of Moscow; Miss Patterson is reported to be losing her mind; Bob Tigert's uncle obtains an injunction to prevent injury of his nephew in the Idaho-W. S. C. game; Miss Patterson dies; the infirmary patients give a gold watch to the leader of the rescue party; the Tigert injunction is vacated; the Colfax paper reports that Tigert has been committed to the insane asylum; the clay land is taken over by the American Insulator Company of New Jersey and 12 carloads of cement and lumber arrive, consigned to Browne.

"I give the details as nearly as possible in the order in which a reporter might learn them," says Mr. Mason. "I include all the trivialities. It is strictly up to the students to pick out the feature. I give no hint. But after they get through I try to help analyze the situation, to see what the story was.

"Our courses in journalism are few and limited. The class in news writing meets only twice a week. It is open even to freshmen, on special permission. It does not pretend to produce journalists, but it does undertake to show the students what journalism is all about.

"I try to make it plain that journalism means a knowledge of everything under the sun—that even to cover a trivial story they must know what the county recorder's office is, that the coroner is not the 'city coroner,' what it means to file suit, the difference between white-ware and white-wear, etc., etc.

"'You take too much for granted,' said one student. I did it deliberately.

"Students who survive this course do good work on the students' semi-weekly paper, the Argonaut. The students run the Argonaut entirely by themselves, but those who wish credit for the work meet weekly with me to criticize the paper. There is also a two-credit course in copy reading.

"Finally (stage whisper) we give a course in 'publicity.' I think it's a good thing. These boys and girls are all going to have to 'write something for the paper' some day. They might as well know how. As EDITOR & PUBLISHER said last April:

"'There is a field for men, operating according to an established code of ethics, between large and unwieldy public and private enterprises and newspapers. Maybe the boys now in the schools of journalism will find it and erect a safe fence around it.' I am working in my own small way on that fence."

5,000 STUDYING JOURNALISM

Enrollment in Schools Shown in Wisconsin Professor's Survey

The study of journalism in universities and colleges since the establishment of the first course by the Uuniversity of Wisconsin in 1905 has increased until now 200 instructors are teaching 5,000 students in 50 schools, according to a survey just made by L. W. Murphy, of the University of Illinois, a 1921 graduate of Wisconsin.

Mr. Murphy's estimate by courses is as follows: Reporting, 3,000 students; feature writing, 2,100; introductory courses, 4,500; advertising, 2,700; copy reading, 1,500; history of journalism, 700; ethics of journalism, 650; country journalism, 450; law of the press, 450.

In addition to these courses, students are enrolled in courses in editorial writing, critical writing, agricultural journalism, the teaching of journalism, publicity, and public opinion. More than 50 professional courses and schools of journalism are operating today, says Mr. Murphy, as compared with approximately 85 schools of medicine and 130 schools of law.

Indiana Retail Lumber Dealers Urge Consistent Advertising

Newspapers afford the best medium for reaching the general public with the advertising messages of retail lumber dealers, according to members of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana in convention last week in Indianapolis.

Association members voiced their approval of this position during the convention sessions and insisted that retail lumber dealers should make a more thorough study of the effectiveness of advertising, especially newspaper advertising, as a means of stimulating wider interest in lumber which goes into homes.

The association devoted practically the entire opening day Wednesday to a study of advertising.

Association leaders urged that every retail lumber dealer should set aside a special fund annually to carry on an aggressive campaign of advertising. Estimates of this fund ranged from one-half of one per cent. to one per cent. of the gross income of a retail lumber business each year.

O. D. Haskett of Indianapolis, president, led the opening discussion of the advertising problems of the retail lumber dealer. Blaine McGrath, president of the Advertising Club of Indianapolis, gave a talk Thursday noon.

U. S. ENVELOPE PRINTING SCORED IN COLORADO

State Editorial Association Passes Resolution Condemning Practice—Arthur Craig Elected President

The government practice of printing return cards on envelopes was condemned by the Colorago Editorial Association at its annaul mid-winter meeting in Denver this week. The low rate quoted by the government diverts this class of printing from newspaper job plants and acts as a detriment to this phase of the newspaper business, it was stated.

The principal business transacted at the meeting was the decision to employ a full-time field secretary, Edward J. Bemis editor of the Littleton Independent was appointed to that post. Funds to defray this expenditure are to be raised by assessment.

Among those in attendance at the conference was Frank O. Edgecombe, publisher of the Geneva (Neb.) Signal, president of the National Editorial Association, who heartily endorsed the field secretary movement.

New officers for the year were elected as follows: Arthur Craig, Greeley, Weld County News, president; R. J. Ball, Loveland Reporter-Herald, vice-president; Edward J. Bemis, secretary and Robert Spencer of the Fort Morgan Times, treasurer.

The following were elected to serve on the Executive Committee: H. F. Lake, Gunnison; L. A. Perry, Hotchkiss; R. J. Marlow, Denver; Bert L. Price, Alamosa, and H. J. West of Golden.

DECLARES CIRCULATION BUILDING CONTESTS SOUNDLY SERVE MANY NEWSPAPERS

By C. B. HOLLISTER

I MUST protest as unfair the statement signed "A Publisher" appearing in EDITOR & PUBLISHER for January 6.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, Philadelphia Inquirer, Los Angeles Times, Indianapolis News, Washington Post, San Francisco Chronicle, Kansas City Journal Post, Philadelphia Record, Memphis Commercial Appeal, Dallas Morning News, San Francisco Bulletin, Louisville Herald, Nashville Banner, Atlanta Journal, Chattanooga Times, Wichita Beacon, Deseret Evening News and such papers certainly are extremely important factors in American journalism. I have conducted campaigns for all those named and more; more than one campaign for many of them. You cannot deny that both they and myself have a right to be heard. Naturally, I cannot speak with authority for anyone else conducting campaigns.

When a newspaper uses my service for a second campaign, I regard that as the best possible endorsement. The Cleveland Plain Dealer was so well satisfied with the methods used and the results obtained with a 1921 campaign that I am now conducting for them, on their invitation, the greatest prize contest ever announced by an American newspaper. Or consider this: In two campaigns for the Philadelphia Inquirer (1919 and 1921) I secured for them over 70,000 new, prepaid subscribers. The Inquirer has never shrunk from the high circulation figures resulting from these campaigns but has gone on to even greater heights. How is that for circulation that counts? Or this: EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S last Year Book shows the Memphis Commercial Appeal with approximately 100,000 circulation, which is more than its two evening competitors combined could claim. At the beginning of 1923 it was printing between 83,000 and 84,000 daily, and easily dominating its field, yet it considered it well worth while to use my campaign services. A gain of 17,000 new, prepaid subscribers resulted—and look at the figures to see if this gain is not holding and mounting, year after year!

There are a few facts plainly set forth. I can multiply similar instances.

Now let me ask if the A. B. C. or any organization should not be a trifle careful about classing as "unmeritorious" (or whatever word "A Publisher" wants) circulation secured by a sales force of ambitious men and women working for prizes, while having no thought on the probable class and merit of readers attracted to a paper by salacious or super-sensational stories, or secured by strongarm solicitors using typical book-salesmen methods among people not capable of resisting them, particularly as no prepayment is asked.

Certainly the writer of that article knows that a large percentage of readers of any newspaper take that particular one as a matter of habit. The opposite is also true. Many people, without giving deep thought to the subject or without real reason, think of a certain paper as not interesting to them. It is to overcome this "inertia of not taking" that newspapers use various means.

Some advertise their wares widely throughout their territory, usually emphasizing various types of features which they try out for the purpose of attracting new readers. Others use premiums, which are inducements to purchasers and which call for constant repetition of the offers to hold the circulation thus gained, since the readers expect a premium as a bonus for taking the paper. Still others use circulation campaigns.

What are these campaigns? They are the organization of sales forces numbering hundreds of men and women in other than the newspaper business, induced by the hope of winning rewards to spend their spare time securing subscriptions for the newspapers.

Naturally, one of these salesmen, or candidate as we call him, will first work among his friends, co-workers, neighbors, and so on, and will obtain their subscriptions on the strength of what it will help him to win. What of it? The subscriptions are secured, the unwillingness of these thousands of people to take the paper is broken down to the extent that the paper is given a hearing which before was denied it, and for a time (our subscriptions are prepaid for an average of nine months to a year) the paper has an opportunity which it could obtain in no other fashion of selling itself to these subscribers.

That a newspaper which has "merit" will hold the great majority of its gain is proven, not only by the examples I have named above, but by many more; a newspaper that hasn't "merit" had better improve itself that way before it attempts to gain or hold any circulation of any kind.

Practically every business uses some type of "introductory offer" to secure new business.

Is "A Publisher" one of those who, either through lack of energy and enterprise on his own part or through intense satisfaction with the status quo of the circulation situation in his own field, wants to throttle by organized action the individual initiative of other publishers seeking higher circulation and therefore greater advertising revenue?

In the first place, I would certainly not advocate to any newspaper the conducting of four annual campaigns when it did not seem able to hold the gain they secured. In the second, the refunding of 20% of all cash turned in to candidates is beyond my experience; the custom is to pay only non-winners a commission, which is practically always 10% and on new subscriptions only.

The slash in prices, however, is the nub of the matter. At one fell swoop "A Publisher" is charging a loss of thousands—on both papers, too, I suppose—to the campaign business. Let me point this out: It was the competitor's recognition of the power of a campaign and of the fact that no other method could equal it, that caused him to inaugurate the price cut. Why the paper conducting the campaign saw fit to follow can not be answered without more facts in the case. That fact remains, from "A Publisher's" statement, that the campaign company evidently did increase its client's circulation by a 40 per cent gain.

The campaign business has existed for thirty years and has been of service to hundreds of papers, many of whom in my opinion, really owe their present prosperity to the progress resulting from a campaign, conducted at a psychological moment. I feel that the publication of such an unfair, misleading, general and anonymous attact as that of "A Publisher" should be condemned.

ADAIR LEAVES CHICAGO NEWS

Composing Room Foreman Severs 50 Years With Paper

Andrew B. Adair has announced his resignation as superintendent of the composing room of the Chicago Daily News, effective Jan. 30, 1926, 28 days after he celebrated his 50th anniversary with the News.

ANDREW B. ADAIR

On Jan. 2, the joint half-century anniversary of both the News and Mr. Adair, his associates in the composing room presented him with a gold watch and chain and the joint chapel of the News held a special meeting, adopting suitable resolutions in recognition of the date. Mr. Adair, in return, presented each of his associates with a copy of his autobiography, which included facts of interest to his fellow workers.

Mr. Adair was born on a farm in Venango county, Penn., Oct. 9, 1850. He went to work at the age of 11 on the death of his father. After the lad had tried many jobs he was apprenticed to the trade of printer, in the office of the Butler (Penn.) American Citizen. He came to Chicago in 1868 where he worked on the Inter Ocean and the Tribune. Several years later he joined the Chicago Morning Courier. When the Daily News was founded, Adair went to work for Victor Lawson, setting the first type for the new paper, the railroad time table. Since then, Jan. 2, 1876, Mr. Adair has been an employe of the News composing room.

"The closing forms of The Chicago Daily News have never been 'late' in all the years of its publication," Mr. Adair said to his associates at the time of the presentation. "I challenge any newspaper in the United States to show a like record."

When Victor F. Lawson died, he left Mr. Adair $25,000. The day that Mr. Adair learned of the bequest he said to an associate:

"I wish Victor Lawson were alive again with my $25,000 in his pocket."

Mr. Adair plans to live in Orange, Cal.

Moore Now Magazine Editor

H. Napier Moore, manager of the Montreal Star News Bureau, has been appointed editor of Maclean's Magazine, succeeding J. V. McKenzie, who becomes editorial representative of the Hearst magazine in London. Mr. Moore began his newspaper career with the Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Journal in 1910. Coming to Canada some time after, he engaged in free lancing until 1915, when he joined the Montreal Star as assistant telegraph editor. From 1918 to 1923 he represented the Star in New York returning to organize the Star's news bureau.

SEATTLE UNION RECORD

There are three other daily newspapers in the field, each getting a good share of National Advertising. THE RECORD at present gets very little. It is not conceivable that the general advertiser wishes to deliberately cut himself off from communication with so large a proportion of the people of Seattle and its trading area.

WE WANT A SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE who can vision our field and sell it to the National Advertiser. Ours is not an easy proposition. It requires a man or an agency with guts and go. Because this newspaper is as yet almost altogether unsold in the national field, the rewards to courage and ability will be proportionately greater. Address

Second Annual Newspaper Institute at U. of North Carolina Draws 100 Editors—Owens Presents Baltimore Sun Cost Figures

WHAT is regarded as one of the most successful press meetings held in North Carolina came to a close Friday afternoon, Jan. 15, with adjournment of the second Newspaper Institute held at Chapel Hill under the auspices of the North Carolina Press Association and the University of North Carolina. There were more than 100 editors in attendance during the three-day session.

JAMES W. ATKINS

Among the speakers were President H. W. Chase of the University; Gov. Angus W. McLean, editor, Richmond (Va.) News-Leader; Frank P. Graham, associate professor of history at the University; Robert W. Lathan, editor, Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier; Ole Buck, field manager, Nebraska Press Association; Hamilton Owens, editor, Baltimore Sun; James C. Latimer, field secretary, Press Congress of the World; M. V. Atwood, managing editor, Utica (N. Y.) Observer-Dispatch; Gerald W. Johnson, professer of journalism at the University; U. L. McCall, Southern Division superintendent, Associated Press, Atlanta, Ga.; Nelson Antrim Crawford, director of information, U. S Department of Agriculture; and James O'Shaughnessy, executive secretary, American Association of Advertising Agencies.

HAMILTON OWENS

The editors were banqueted Thursday evening at the Carolina Inn, during the course of which phases of the publishing business were discussed by experts. Higher ideals were stressed throughout. The ethics of the newspaper profession came in for much attention. The growing activities of the publicity experts representatives of men and corporations with selfish motives, engaged in trying to "put over something," were considered.

Hamilton Owens, editor of the Baltimore Sun, gave the Institute a highly interesting discussion of problems in making a newspaper budget. Mr. Owens came in place of Paul Patterson, publisher of the Sun, who was detained in Baltimore.

Mr. Owens brought a chart showing how the budget of the Sun newspapers is divided among the various departments. He pointed out that of the total expenditures last year, 16.23 per cent went to the editorial and news departments; 17.30 per cent went to the mechanical department; 6.03 per cent went for the distribution of the newspapers (wages, materials, transportation, postage, etc.); while other expenditures were divided as follows: 3.16 per cent for circulation (executive and promotion salaries, office, promotion and other expenses); 5.19 per cent for advertising and business (salaries, traveling and promotion); 2.26 per cent for accounting (salaries and collection expense); 2.72 per cent for administration (salaries of officers, postage, telephone, legal and general office expenses); .53 for maintenance of property and plant (building and plant); 41.53 per cent for newsprint and news ink; 5.27 per cent for photogravure paper and printing and comic paper and printing (although photos and comics are included in the editorial expense).

The newspapers of the South are not competently manned to meet the swift changes that have taken place during the last decade, Robert Lathan, editor of the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier, in an address Thursday morning.

"Ten years ago most of the questions which we had to handle were of long standing and we were all reasonably familiar with them," he declared. "Today we do not know the facts of the problems upon whose solution so much depends.

"The news that goes on the sporting pages is written and edited by experts. Of how many other news departments of the average southern newspapers is that true? How many reporters can you name who could write a story about such matters that would have any special value? How many first class reporters do you know of any kind outside of sports?

"The men can be had. All of us see them come from time to time. Most of the time we see them go. Why do they go? Because they are not paid enough. That is the plain truth bluntly put."

Newspapers of North Carolina should carry more local advertising than they now have, James O'Shaughnessy stated in his address Friday.

"The bulk of newspaper advertising is local and probably always will be," he said. "The publisher gives more thought to his local advertising. But with all that the average newspaper publisher does not give local advertising all the study it deserves.

"The more local advertising the newspaper carries, the more national advertising may be attracted and we know that the more national advertising carried the more local advertising follows in its train.

"Almost without exception the weekly should be carrying more local advertising and preserving the normal ratio of national advertising to local advertising."

At the Friday session, M. V. Atwood, managing editor of the Utica Observer-Dispatch gave two talks—one before the group of weekly publishers and the other before the publishers of dailies.

To the daily group, Mr. Atwood presented the results of a survey he made of North Carolina dailies for the Chapel Hill conference.

Ole Buck recommended that the assembled editors employ a field representative.

His recommendation for a field man for North Carolina was taken under consideration, and it is probable that such a man will be put in the field at the next meeting, at which time business will be transacted and officers elected. James W. Atkins, managing editor of the Gastonia Gazette and president of the North Carolina Association presided at the sessions.

Before dispersing the newspaper folk endorsed the Institute idea. President H. W. Chase, of the University, invited the visitors to make Chapel Hill their permanent headquarters, stating that the University and the newspapers were working toward a common goal—the education of the public.

F. M. KEFFER NEW HEAD OF CALIFORNIA GROUP

Publisher of Van Nuys News Elected President of Southern Editorial Assn. — Government Envelope Printing Hit

More than 200 editors, publishers and newspaper men attended the 38th annual convention of the Southern California Editorial Association at the Clark Hotel, Los Angeles, Jan. 15-16. The meeting was doubly important for in addition to routine business, much attention was given to completing arrangements for entertaining the national convention of the National Editorial Association in Los Angeles June 30 to July 3, inclusive. To assist in this matter H. C. Hotaling of St. Paul, executive secretary of the N. E. A. was present.

J. R. Gabbert, retiring president, was in the chair. The convention deplored the attitude of the Federal Government in encroaching upon the business of country newspaper job shops in the matter of envelope printing, recommended the adoption of uniform legal rates, discussed ways and means for checking the free publicity evil, and considered libel involvements.

Election of officers resulted in the selection of Frank M. Keffer, publisher of the Van Nuys News as president. Other officers are: Harry S. Webster, publisher, San Bernardino Sun, first vice-president and chairman of the dailies division; Tobias Larson, publisher and editor, Claremont Courier, second vice-president and chairman of weeklies division; Will E. Westland, editor Upland News, third vice-president and chairman of printers' division.

The Association amended its constitution, eliminating the post of secretary. Instead provision was made for an executive secretary and business manager Ben H. Read, who has been functioning in practically same capacity during past year, was named to this post. A. V. Douglas of the Lahabra Star was elected treasurer.

New members of the executive committee are: Carroll S. Smith, Lamesa Scout; J. J. Fraser, Oxford Courier, and F. S. Hosfelt, Colton Courier. Three members holding over are O. M. Cannon, Santa Maria Times; M. D. Witter, Brawley News, and E. O. Wickizer, South Pasadena Record.

Executive Secretary Hotaling of the National Editorial Association in his address charged that country newspaper publishers who depend in part on their job departments are being unfairly infringed on by the U. S. Post Office Department.

"Newspapers have almost reached the end of their rope because of enormous Federal tax burdens and other discriminations," he said. "It is high time for publishers everywhere to make common cause that their influence may be felt in Washington. They can if they will."

Mr. Hotaling prophesied that the forthcoming N. E. A. convention would mean much to California.

Following the convention all of the visitors started on a tour of the State under the auspices of the Associated California Chambers of Commerce. They were to visit 65 cities. The Women's Auxiliary of the Southern Editorial Association organized with Verna Gates Hosfelt of the Colton Courier, president; Mrs. Ben H. Read, Los Angeles, vice-president, and Mrs. C. H. Turner of Redondo to provide for entertainment of the editors en route.

The chief local interest in the convention just closed was centred around the award of two trophies for outstanding editorial achievements. The Los Angeles Times cup for the Southern California weekly producing the best appearing first page went to Timothy Brownhill, publisher of the Puente Journal. There was keen competition between 40 entries. J. P. Baumgartner, publisher of the Santa Ano Register, won the J. R. Gabbert cup for the best editorial page appearing in any daily member of the Association. The contests were judged by Marc N. Goodnow, head of Journalism Department, University of Southern California; H. C. Hotaling of the N. E. A., and Burton L. Smith, State editor, Los Angeles Times.

Ludlow Proves Indispensable

Mr. William T. Delaphaine expresses his opinion of the service the Ludlow is giving the News and Post of Frederick, Maryland.

"WE have had our Ludlow in service for four years in our newspaper plant. It has been used day and night on our two daily papers, The News, afternoon, and The Post, morning, supplying the bulk of our advertising display and also considerable head letter.

"We pride ourselves on having the best equipped newspaper plant in the United States for a city of this size and we feel that the Ludlow is an indispensable part of our equipment."

LUDLOW QUALITY COMPOSITION

SELL in the Iowa Market —because Iowa is able to BUY!

Alert manufacturers of quality products are taking advantage of the opportunity to give their 1926 sales a big boost by advertising in Iowa's daily newspapers. The increased buying power of Iowa's 586,000 families—practically all of whom are readers of Iowa Daily Newspapers—coupled with the definite aid available to advertisers by the Iowa Daily Press Association, now affords an unparalleled opportunity for profitable merchandising.

The IOWA MERCHANDISING PLAN Will Help You SELL—

The following definite help in marketing your products is available in 31 leading cities and towns—guaranteed to every advertiser using 5,000 lines or more of space by the Iowa Daily Press Association.

Individual Papers Will:

1. Make a study of local market and trade territory.
2. Supply complete and accurate list of retail grocers, druggists and other lines of business in newspaper's home and surrounding territory.
3. Introduce the advertiser's salesman to a number of big retailers. Advise advertiser as to relative sales standing of competing products.
4. Urge retailers to feature displays of nationally advertised products, and furnish advertiser with names of stories that will make use of window displays.
5. Make market investigation for prospective advertisers. (Identity to be made known first.)
6. Urge local retailers to mention advertiser's products in their own advertisements, thus tying up with the company's.
7. Send, on receipt of contract, a multigraphed letter to list of retailers in the territory, telling of the campaign.

Consider these FACTS—

Iowa is first in the number of automobiles on farms.

The value of Iowa's corn, oats, horses, hogs, poultry and eggs tops all other states.

Iowa's farms exceed in value those of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Deleware, Maryland, West Virginia, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, New Mexico and Wyoming combined.

Iowa's wool crop is worth more than California's figs.

Iowa's apple crop is worth more than that of any of the Pacific or Mountain States.

One-half of all America's washing machines are manufactured in Iowa.

Iowa has the largest plants in the production of Baskets, Buttons, Crackers, Macaroni, Butter, Cereals, Calendars, Steel Furnaces, Stump Pullers, Wall Plaster, Brick and Tile, Motor Tractors and Washing Machines.

The percentage of illiteracy in Iowa is smaller than in any other state—and nearly every family takes a daily newspaper! (586,070 families—newspaper circulation, 571,485.)

SOCIETY OF EDITORS

WHAT is the matter with the membership of the American Society of Newspaper Editors? With a splendid program offering, only a handful of editors attended last week's annual meeting at Washington. It is inconceivable that daily newspaper editors would permit such classic events as Dr. George Barton Cutten's psychoanalysis of news, William Hard's penetrating discussion of the political job, or indeed a half dozen other really great speeches on vitals of newspaper work, to pass them by if there was any way short of stage-coaching to reach Washington. Why those vacant chairs? We are puzzled.

If you want to get a brand new slant on the art of editing turn immediately to Dr. Cutten's address, which we are presenting practically in full text in this issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Here is stuff to stir the dry bones of routine practice! You don't have to agree entirely with it to get a thrill. Only two score newspaper editors heard the paper read.

The editor's society is a success. It was wisely launched and its conduct to date has been admirable. No egotist or stuffed shirt has succeeded in playing czar over it. No one has used it for selfish ends. It is democratic, wide-open for all eligible editors, the debates are sincere and soundly helpful because smacking of actual practice, and the speakers have been selected for what they might be expected to reveal rather than for position or oratory.

If the society had done nothing more than give to the profession the Code of Ethics of 1923, which has become the law of our journalism, its existence would be a thousand times justified. But it has done much more and it is obvious that its work has just begun. Its field is as broad as the universe.

Individualistic editors, editors who are tied to their desks, editors who are satisfied with old conventions, should be assigned by their publishers to attend every society meeting, in the opinion of EDITOR & PUBLISHER. No expense bill of the year should be more readily audited. Young, eager editorial men, who believe that the edge of newspaper service has only been scratched, should attend and throw their hats into the ring of the open forum. No editor with ears to hear and mind to comprehend can sit through a session of this society and fail to gain impressions that will improve his daily product.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER takes great pride in presenting in this issue, for the benefit of the craft, a stenographic report of the proceedings and principal addresses. If you want a feast of information and a new inspiration for achievement in journalism, read it and put it on file for the ready reference of the staff.

What are you doing to get the newspaper or advertising society of which you are a member attacking the press agent evil?

EDITORIAL PAGE DECLINE

ADDITIONAL reasons for declining interest in some editorial pages are presented herewith.

The following is the first paragraph of an editorial found in a newspaper of the Middle West:

> "When Mr. Richmond Pearson Hobson was in town some weeks ago, a few such fine and logical minds as those of Mr. ——— and Mr. ———, and others equally altruistic and up to date, marveled at the shocking conditions rampant in this country which Mr. Hobson brought to their attention as an officer of the International Narcotic Education Association, an outgrowth of the famous conference held a year or so ago in Geneva in connection with the League of Nations, and in which the Family of Nations represented in that body, and others without its pale like the United States, fought valorously to check the appalling growth of this evil everywhere, but particularly in this land of 'the free and the brave'."

Here is another concrete answer to the problem of sustaining popular interest in editorial views, clipped from another newspaper whose identity is mercifully concealed:

> "It is desirable that the people of the city get to know their Municipal Manager, but rather by his works than by his words. The one counts, or it discounts the other, which in that case better had not been said. The informal appearing of the City Manager before some popular gatherings of the mingled population, irrespective of classes, has its merit as an acquaintance-maker through personal appearance and personal touch."

For a dream cometh through the multitude of business; and a fool's voice is known by multitude of words.—Ecclesiastes, V; 3.

LABOR NEWS

"YOU have put your finger on one of the weakest spots in American journalism," writes a veteran New York newspaper man in reference to EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S view that the coal strike has been the worst neglected big story of recent years.

"In this town," the letter continues, "the only paper that makes labor a full-time assignment is the New York World. Yet we have in New York 600,000 or more union card holders, and goodness knows how many employers and others directly interested in union-made products. And New York does better than most American cities, with the possible exception of Boston, which for years has gone in for labor news more extensively, though perhaps not more intelligently, than any other city.

"The whole trouble with labor news is that from time immemorial it has been reported on the police court basis—the big story has been the number of heads busted, or the calling out of troops.

"The fact is often overlooked that there is another side to labor; that is, someone else besides union men are interested in labor news. Employers, investors, business men generally are vitally interested and a newspaper that pays attention to such news will get as many inquiries from banks as from labor men."

We publish these observations as a constructive suggestion to editors. We believe them to be true. Labor is the rock upon which the whole structure of the man-made world stands. Its news is much more vital to the welfare of every strata of society than much news that is being stressed, such, for instance, as news concerning financial speculation. Labor is not necessarily "union labor." The best labor reporter is an honorable and experienced newspaper man with a background of economics. He approaches his subject fearlessly and with open eyes and ears. He gets the "whole story." His primary object is not to produce sensations, nor create news situations. He is not a police reporter.

CONGRATULATION PAGES

THE editor of the Journal of Electricity is greatly exercised because of the practice among newspapers of selling special advertising pages dedicated to congratulation of those who have sold supplies to a new building, theatre or public work. It is charged that many newspapers send out high-powered solicitors to use a "padded club" on supply houses. The electric supply men regard this as "an evil," it is said, and the Pacific Coast Electrical Association has "gone on record for the abatement of the nuisance." The Journal of Electricity asserts that the advertising is worthless.

We do not believe that "congratulatory advertising" is first-class advertising, and we do not think it is worthless. It is not to be supposed that public knowledge of the fact that a dealer in electric supplies has done a good job on a theatre will fail of some good to his business. But EDITOR & PUBLISHER does believe that much time and effort is wasted on the part of newspapers in selling such space. The same energy and expense devoted to selling contract advertising to supply dealers, with all of the certainty of results that goes with a regular schedule, would net the newspaper higher returns both in dollars and advertiser satisfaction.

"Today"—magic word in news copy, justifying millions of trifles.

GOVERNMENT IN INDUSTRY

COMMERCIAL printers, particularly country publishers, are up in arms over the attitude of the Postmaster General toward the practice of the department in printing envelopes in competition with private industry. Naturally, printing on a huge scale, the Government has been able to cut the price until the envelope business of the small printer has all but been wiped out.

In a thousand instances annually, in all the courts of the land, and in every public office, the principle is confirmed that the function of our government is to foster and stimulate private industry and not compete with it.

One angle of the controversy is that the Government, by doing the printing, can control the return notice and thereby reduce deal-letter operations, but it seems that the department might very well make a regulation as to notices which must appear on letter mail, when printed privately, and thus achieve the same result, without harming a private industry. The National Editorial Association is making a hard fight for the industry, claiming that government operation has caused hardship among the country printers.

It all seems a bit absurd and humorous that the lowly envelope should have been selected for the huge experiment of government ownership and operation in this country.

New and interesting circulation promotion idea, created by Bernarr Macfadden in New York, is publication of a tabloid weekly devoted to the interests of newsdealers.

ADVERTISING OPPORTUNITY

IN a recent issue the Dallas Dispatch called readers' attention to the fact that of all the commodities the average man buys fire insurance is taken wholly on faith. The buyer usually calls some acquaintance for the name of an agent and blindly accepts what the agent proposes. Only rarely does he inquire as to the company's reliability or general policies. Like banks and other institutions in Texas, and other States, the insurance company can not operate without a license, which seems to mean everything to the buyer.

However, as the editorial points out, some fire insurance companies are better than others. Some are liberal. Some fight every claim they can. Companies that have special advantages to offer rarely advertise the fact and this vast business, so far as the average citizen is concerned, is done in the dark.

If there are independent fire insurance companies out to cover the field in a great way, the opportunity to do so through newspaper advertising seems virgin

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

HENRY M. JAMES, who recently purchased the common stock of the Hudson (N.Y.) Daily Star from Albert W. Fell, is a lawyer as well as newspaper man. After training in a local law office he attended the Albany Law School, where he was graduated with the class of 1909 and was subsequently admitted to practice in the courts by the state.

HENRY M. JAMES

During his high school days, Mr. James took up newspaper work as a reporter on the Hudson Evening Register. After the death of the late Charles Esselstyn, for many years editor of the Hudson Republican, Mr. James succeeded to the editorial chair of the Republican. He was one of the organizers of the Hudson Chamber of Commerce and served as a member of its first board of directors.

Mr. James for a number of years has been secretary of the Republican County Committee. He was elected a member of the Assembly in the November elections, representing Columbia County.

The Star was established in 1820, and has greatly increased its gross business during its five-year ownership and control by Messrs Fell and Van Loan. Mr. Fell remains as the largest preferred stockholder, and will retain his connection with the paper in an advisory capacity.

The Best Sports Feature

NORMAN E. BROWN

NORMAN E. BROWN and JACK SORDS, sports experts of The Central Press Association's complete and exclusive daily illustrated news and feature service, are leaders in their field.

Jack Sord's sports cartoons (three columns, three times weekly), are features of more than 400 newspapers, and competitors pay him the supreme compliment of imitating his style and ideas.

Norman E. Brown, sporting editor of Central Press, is one of the three or four most widely read sports writers in America, and speaks daily to an interested audience of several millions. He is preparing to make his annual swing around the Southern training camps to report on the teams of the major leagues and the most important minor circuits, for Central Press clients. His daily stories will be illustrated with photos by staff cameramen.

The work of these two is augmented by a corps of special correspondents in all parts of the country. Central Press service clients receive a wealth of illustrated sports stories.

The Best Sports Feature—the weekly full page sports pictorial—is a Central Press product.

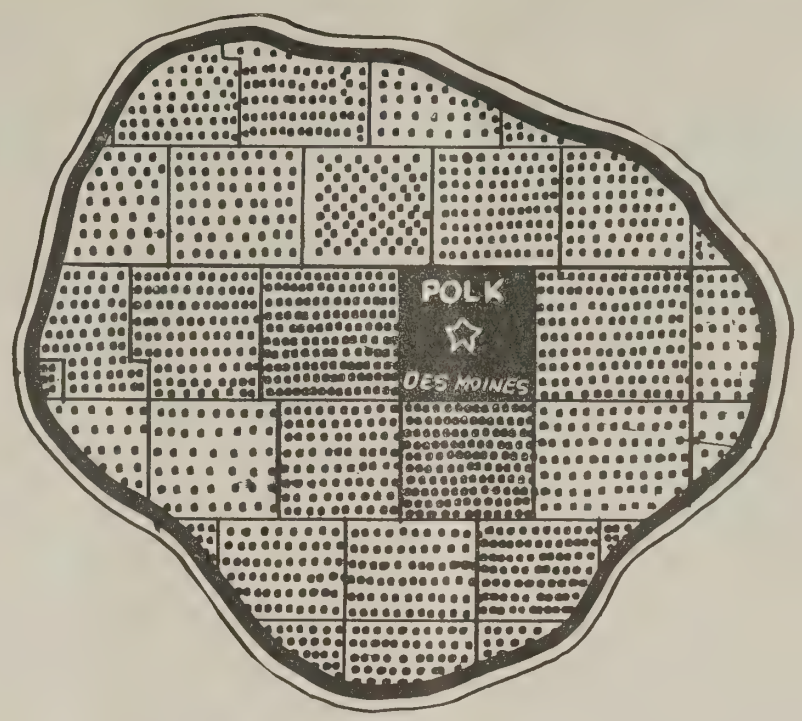
FOLLOW THE LEAD OF YOUR EDITORS

—in Church publicity



The importance of church attendance is coming to the front in newspapers more and more. A few years ago church news seldom, if ever, appeared on the first page of a newspaper. Now, because editors are sensing the growing interest of the public in religion and church activities, numerous editorials are appearing daily and it is not uncommon to see church news on page 1.

Advertising Managers have a great opportunity to further the development of their pages by following the lead of the editors in church publicity.

Develop church advertising in your pages and let us help with plans and our new series of cooperative Come-to-Church advertisements.

8% Circulation Gain in 2 Months for

Here is the Des Moines trade area—by far the greatest market in Iowa. The great volume of Capital circulation shown above explains The Capital's ability to control this market so completely for advertisers. Each dot represents five subscribers.

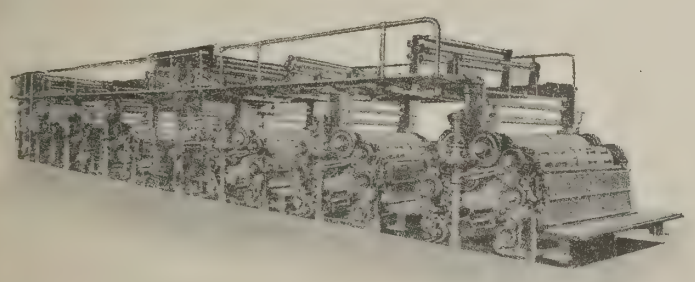
The Des Moines Capital

—That is the gain in Des Moines alone—And increases are continuing at a rate of more than 2,000 a month. No forced methods of any kind—it is just a part of the enthusiastic response Iowa is giving to the finer editorial content and finer physical appearance of the Greater Capital.

Concentrated in Iowa's Major Market

ALL of these circulation gains are within Des Moines' immediate trade territory, shown on the map above.

They are CONCENTRATED in this big major market in such volume that they can win real leadership for the products advertised. No Des Moines newspaper can deliver more than this market—and no newspaper can deliver it as completely as The Capital.



Leads in Department Store Advertising

Again, in the year just closed, Des Moines department stores placed more advertising in The Capital than in any other Des Moines newspaper. The Capital has led in department store advertising for 30 years, simply because it has the vital power to create genuine sales volume for its advertisers.

It is one thing to talk generalities about the Iowa market. But it is quite another matter to produce tangible results in the various advertising mediums used. Department stores keep their own records, they check their returns frequently, and they buy space accordingly. In Des Moines they prefer The Capital.

$135,000 in New Presses in 1926

—including the most modern newspaper press in Iowa

This is one of the new, giant presses recently purchased by The Des Moines Capital. It is a Goss double-sextuple, capable of producing 72,000 papers per hour—the most modern newspaper press in Iowa. It will be installed and in operation by March 15.

27 Million Lines of Advertising

A New Record for The Kansas City Star

IN 1925 The Kansas City Star, Daily and Sunday, printed 27,228,390 agate lines of paid advertising, attaining a new record and surpassing the 1924 total by 1,842,893 lines!

The consistency of the gains in both the local and national classifications and in all The Star's various editions is a significant feature of this remarkable achievement.

It means that the prosperity of the Southwest and the growth of The Star are not the result of a freak or temporary condition, but built upon a foundation of economic stability which gives promise of ever greater achievements in 1926.

For months the business maps have shown Kansas City in the center of one of the most favored zones in the United States. Financially and industrially the city and territory are in the best condition in years.

The Star's circulation keeps pace with population growth and still offers advertisers a coverage which twice each day equals the number of families in Greater Kansas City, in addition to a circulation of more than 100,000 outside of Kansas City. The Kansas City Star prints and circulates approximately half a million copies a day.

From the Lakes to San Francisco no other newspaper has anything like as large a circulation as either the morning or evening edition of the Kansas City Star

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

Frank Simonds Sails to Attend Conference at Geneva—"Dick and His Dad," New Comic Strip by Bishop—Bryant Joins Bell Syndicate Sales Staff

FRANK SIMONDS, well known newspaper writer, sailed from New York, Jan. 16, to attend the forthcoming Conference at Geneva, where he will represent about 40 newspapers, including several in Mexico, Cuba, Poland, England and Japan. His articles are distributed by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

FRANK SIMONDS

Following the conference, Mr. Simonds will visit Rome, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Budapest, and probably London and Warsaw. He will write on pertinent international subjects.

Before leaving on his present trip as roving correspondent, Mr. Simonds was guest of honor at a farewell luncheon given by Thomas Chadbourne, New York attorney, at the Downtown Association. Personal friends of Mr. Simonds attended. There were no speeches, the program being limited to informal discussion of international topics.

Basil A. Caparell, former vice-president and general manager of United Newspictures, Inc., has joined the executive staff of King Features Syndicate, Inc., New York.

B. A. CAPARELL

Caparell started his newspaper career with the United Press in 1912 and worked in all departments of that organization. He was appointed its commercial manager in 1914, was made eastern business representative in 1916, and assistant business manager in charge of sales in 1918. During that year, Caparell was also manager of United Features Syndicate. He became sales manager of the U. P. Central Division in 1921. Two years later he was brought back to New York and put in charge of United Newspictures, which post he held until joining King Features Syndicate last week.

"Dick and His Dad," a new daily comic strip by Wallace Bishop, will shortly be distributed nationally by King Features Syndicate, Inc., it was announced this week. Bishop started his comic art career on the Bloomington (Ill.) Daily Pantagraph, where his first drawings were published. He later studied in Chicago.

William Bryant, formerly connected with the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, has joined the sales staff of the Bell Syndicate, Inc. He has been in the newspaper syndicate business for the past 15 years, and is widely known among newspaper editors and publishers. For McClure he has recently been traveling between Halifax and Florida, and as far West as Cincinnati. He has not yet been assigned to a specific territory by the Bell Syndicate.

Beatrice Burton, author of "Love Bound," "The Flapper Wife," and other stories, has completed a new newspaper serial which will be offered beginning Feb. 11, by Johnson Features, Inc., it was announced this week. The name of the new serial has not yet been made public.

Stephen Mellin has joined the staff of the McClure Newspaper Syndicate and will be located in the New York office.

Tom McNamara, who has drawn "Us Boys" for several years for the King Features Syndicate, Inc., is visiting New York. He and Mrs. McNamara live in the far west, where they will return in a few weeks.

Helen Keller will write a daily article of approximately 500 words each for Famous Features Syndicate, New York, under the heading "Into the Light."

The Bell Syndicate, Inc., has obtained second serial rights to "That Royle Girl," by Edwin Balmer, which is being offered newspapers concurrently with a motion picture version of the story.

Mary Graham Bonner, who has written a daily "Daddy's Bedtime Story" for the Western Newspaper Union for the past nine years, is the author of "A Parent's Guide to Children's Reading," just published by Funk & Wagnalls. This is Miss Bonner's sixth book, the others being collections of her syndicated stories.

Will Gould is now drawing a daily series of three-column sports cartoons for King Features Syndicate, Inc., New York.

Karl K. Kitchen, writer of the column "Up and Down Broadway" for the New York World Syndicate has sold to First National the screen rights to "A Man's Way," a story that in itself has an unusual story behind it.

Ten years ago "A Man's Way" was written for the stage and submitted to Charles Frohman. Mr. Frohman was interested and took it with him on his ill-fated trip on the Lusitania. It went down with "C. F." and Mr. Kitchen did not do it over. In his Broadway rambles he mentioned the fate of his play to one of the First National officials and was encouraged to try it over for the screen. He did so, and "A Man's Way" was accepted.

"Lost Leaves of History" by P. E. Sumner is a new daily cartoon added to the list of the Premier Syndicate, New York. The cartoons are based on Napoleon's definition that "history is fiction agreed upon."

Contributors to the current Weekly Feature Page offered by the International Syndicate, Baltimore, Md., include Lillian Hayden Hieston, who writes a descriptive article on the city of Bordeaux, and Rene Bach, who tells how an invention has solved the problem of converting shark skins into leather.

At the annual stockholders meeting of the Editorial Service Co. Inc., held at the offices of the company, 86 Michigan street, Milwaukee, Wis., Jan. 13, the following officers were elected: President, David K. "NOT BEN DAY"!

The Border Strips featured in this advertisement are not Ben Dayed but reproduced as line engraving by simply laying our Shading Sheet No. 132 over copy. No machine required.

THE HUTCHISON ARTIST SHADING MEDIUM is especially adapted to newspaper work where speed, economy and certainty of results are most essential.

This method is new, but not an experiment, having been in continuous use for over a year from coast to coast. It can be handled by Artists, Engravers or Laymen and is now for the first time free of all license fees and reproduction restrictions.

Cost:—It will reduce both time and cost at least 30 to 50%, with the great added advantage of enabling the exact effect to be seen before reproducing. It is the quickest possible way of graying "Heavy Blacks" and building up "Weak Whites." It can be used on any type of background and reproduced as line or half-tone.

Users:—All of Hearst's New York papers, all of Munsey's New York papers, New York World, Brooklyn Eagle, Times, Kansas City Star, Toledo Blade and Louisville Courier-Journal, are among our regular newspaper users.

CORRECTLY used, it does not need the assistance of any other Shading Method, but will prove FASTER, MUCH MORE ECONOMICAL AND MUCH MORE EFFECTIVE than any System on the market today.

Briefly, this Medium consists of transparent sheets with photographically opaque characters of a "Ben Day" nature on them. This detail is quickly and easily removable from any portion desired, and, where left will combine photographically with the under detail of the copy. The copy is in no way affected when the sheet is removed.

This is an exact repetition of our Announcement of September 26, 1925, which was our first and only Announcement to the Newspapers of America. As a result, within thirty days, we were so oversold that we have not yet entirely caught up.

This second Announcement is an apology to those whose orders we have not been able to fill promptly and in full.

This is also a promise that from this time on they will have little cause for complaint, especially those who will cooperate with us and estimate their needs a little in advance. Remember, one month is required for complete manufacture and proper seasoning.

WE HAVE INSTALLED OUR OWN MANUFACTURING PLANT, MULTIPLYING OUR PRODUCTIVE CAPACITY. The number of designs have been increased. The quality will also be improved wherever possible.

Every newspaper or publication, with or without "Ben Day" Departments, can use this "Shading Medium" to advantage. If you have a "Ben Day" Department, it will make you less dependent on it, and its limitations. If you haven't a "Ben Day" Department, it will make one unnecessary. If you give out your work, it will save you both time and money.

PRICES: Single sheets, $1.00; 50 sheets or over, 50c. per sheet; 500 sheets or over, 35c. per sheet. Working accessories, 60c. per set. NEWSPAPER MEN TO HELP COMPLETE CATHEDRAL OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE

W. T. Dewart Heads Committee to Raise $150,000 for a Bay Suggested by Late Frank A. Munsey—F. A. Walker Reports Editors Receptive of Plan

NEWSPAPERS of the United States will be represented by a bay in the nave of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, it was announced this week by Bishop William T. Manning.

The plan to have journalism join the other professions in having a share in the erection of the cathedral was suggested by the late Frank A. Munsey. Less than a month before his death he broached the thought to Bishop Manning, and Thursday, Jan. 14, a preliminary committee of publishers was formed. the bays of the nave to represent the press. It is interesting to know that the formation of this committee was suggested to me by Frank A. Munsey only one month before his death and I am deeply gratified that Mr. Dewart has accepted the chairmanship of it. It is peculiarly significant and appropriate that there should be a bay to symbolize the work and ideals of the press. Certainly the press and the church should be in close sympathy and cooperation. There are no two agencies which more vitally and powerfully affect human life and endeavor than these two.

Photograph of architect's model of the outer aisle of the nave, showing four bays. The entrance to the chapel alcove of one is directly back of the figures. The Newspaper Bay will be similar in construction and design to those shown here.

The committee has set $150,000 as a minimum objective. Donations and pledges already in hand amount to $20,000. The committee is to be national in scope. William T. Dewart, who is carrying on the work of his late chief and associate, Mr. Munsey, has been selected to head the newspaper executives.

F. A. Walker, publisher of the New York Telegram, reporting for Mr. Dewart, said:

"It was only last Thursday that we met with the Bishop and started proceedings for the press's participation in the building of a bay. I went to Washington on Friday to attend a convention of editors and I spoke of the cathedral plan and I found all receptive to the idea of the press participating. Literature in connection with the press bay is being prepared and the selection of a nation-wide committee is in progress. We report subscriptions of $20,000."

In announcing the participation of the press, Bishop Manning said:

"It gives me special pleasure to make the very important announcement that a committee has now been formed with William T. Dewart as chairman to raise a minimum of $150,000 to build one of

The newspaper profession has interested itself in the Cathedral project from the first. New York publishers gave editorial support to the campaign, opened their columns to news of the movement, and made very substantial gifts to the general building fund. The gifts made heretofore will not be applied toward the cost of the newspaper bay in the nave.

The late Frank A. Munsey gave $100,000 to the building fund. In the public appeal last year Ralph Pulitzer of the New York World organized a committee in the division of business men which raised more than $30,000. Included in this sum were gifts of $10,000 each from Mr. Pulitzer and Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of the Times, and there were numerous contributions from newspapers and newspaper staffs. A committee representing the magazines, with Lee W. Maxwell as chairman, raised more than $9,500, and a committee representing the printing trades, of which Isaac H. Blanchard was chairman, turned in nearly $3,000.

Serving with Mr. Pulitzer on the newspaper committee were Felix Arnold, Herbert F. Gunnison, Frank A. Munsey and Adolph S. Ochs.

The business men's division, of which the newspaper, magazine and printing committees formed part, has been raising $1,000,000 toward the cost of the west front of the Cathedral.

Dr. John H. Finley, associate editor of the Times, is chairman of the division of education in the Cathedral organization. Many other newspaper and advertising men have given their time and money to further the campaign for funds.

Earnest Elmo Calkins Heads Calkins & Holden, Inc.—George L. Dyer Company Moves to New Quarters—Reynolds President of Albert Frank & Co.

Earnest Elmo Calkins

EARNEST ELMO CALKINS was elected president of Calkins & Holden, Inc., New York advertising agency, at the annual meeting of the directors held this week. He succeeds the late Ralph Holden.

Other officers elected were W. C. Calkins, Jr., vice-president; Tom Hall, vice-president; R. P. Clayberger, treasurer; and James A. Clarke, secretary.

Calkins & Holden was organized in January, 1902, as a partnership. It was incorporated in 1905. Mr. Holden, who died recently, was president for 20 years. Mr. Calkins has been vice-president, during the same period. Both Mr. Clayberger and Mr. Hall have been with the firm for more than 20 years; Mr. Calkins, Jr., for more than 18 years; and Mr. Clarke for 12 years.

At the annual meeting of the directors of Albert Frank & Co. the following officers were elected for the coming year:

Frank J. Reynolds, president; Harry Rascovar, first vice-president and treasurer; Mark Ash, secretary; Lloyd B. Myers, M. Robert Herman, John H. Schwarting, Jr., E. W. Kimmelberg, W. Frank McClure, in charge of the Chicago office, J. Bartlett Hydorn, in charge of the Boston office, vice-presidents, and George Borst, assistant secretary.

In honor of Mr. Ash, who was elected for the twenty-fifth time secretary, and is celebrating his twenty-fifth anniversary with the company, the officers gave a dinner at the Biltmore Hotel and presented him with silver.

After maintaining offices for the past 18 years at 42 Broadway, New York, the George L. Dyer Company moved Jan. 16, to new headquarters in the Murray Hill building, 285 Madison avenue, where the firm will occupy the entire 20th floor. The same agency has a Chicago office at 33 South Clark street.

John D. Lucas, for several years with the United States Rubber Company, and more recently with George Batten, Inc., has joined the plan department of the Charles W. Hoyt Company, Inc. Frank R. Farnham has also joined the staff of this same department. He was formerly an account executive with Frank Seaman, Inc.

James F. Jennings, formerly of the Newell-Emmett Company, has been appointed space buyer in the New York office of the William H. Rankin Company. The same agency announces the promotion of H. R. Schaeffer to the position of merchandising and production manager.

Donald K. Moore, an account executive in the Detroit office of the Campbell-Ewald Company, has been appointed manager of that agency's Chicago office. Mr. Moore has been with the Campbell-Ewald Company for several years. For a number of years he has been assistant manager of the new business department. Prior to joining the agency he was for two and a half years secretary and treasurer and assistant general manager of the Traub Manufacturing Company, Detroit.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

Daggett & Ramsdell Using Newspaper Rotogravure Sections—New $1,000,000 Plant for Fada Radio Firm—Obermeyer to Assist Livingston on Cosolidated Gas

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL, makers of cold cream, have started using advertising space in newspaper rotogravure sections. At present the schedule is limited to Sunday newspapers in New York and Chicago, but an official of the company informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week there was a possibility of extending the list following the end of the present season. The firm's fiscal year ends in June, and advertising plans will be decided upon prior to that date.

The company in addition to rotogravure is now advertising in four women's magazines. The account is handled by the M. P. Gould Company.

F. A. D. Andrea, Inc., manufacturer of Fada radio, has purchased more than an acre of ground in the Bronx, New York, on which he plans to erect a modern $1,000,000 plant exclusively for the manufacture of radio apparatus.

Robert E. Livingston, who for many years has been director of advertising of the Consolidated Gas Company of New York, is to have the assistance of Henry Obermeyer as copy writer. Mr. Obermeyer has been editor of the monthly magazine of the Gas Association.

From an errand girl four years ago to supervisor of advertising for Joske Brother Company, San Antonio department store, is the unusual record of 23-year-old Helen McCoy. Miss McCoy has been promoted to that position in succession to Jane Wood, who resigned to join the Thelma Gaines Advertising Agency, San Antonio.

After being graduated from high school in 1921, Miss McCoy became an errand girl in Joske's. Shortly thereafter she was advanced to proof-reading and checking work in the advertising department. This was a step to the writing of advertising copy and later the preparation of all copy advertising the firm's downstairs department.

Fred K. Miller, advertising manager of the L. S. Donaldson department store at Minneapolis, Minn., has been elected to the board of directors of the company.

Baxter M. Eastburn has been made advertising manager of the Trivers Stores, Inc., it is announced from the Dallas office of this company, which has several stores in Texas. Mr. Eastburn, who has been advertising director for J. Blach & Sons, will maintain headquarters in New York. He will handle advertising for all 18 of the Trivers stores from his New York office.

Northern N. Y. Press Meeting

The Northern New York Press Association is holding its annual convention Jan. 22-23 at the Woodruff House, Watertown, N. Y. The meeting was to be opened with a Fellowship Dinner, with an address of welcome by John B. Harris, Mayor of Watertown, and response by F. Dudley Course, association president. The principal speaker was to be Prof. Bristow Adams, of the Extension Department of Cornell University, on "Some Observations in Journalism."

Letters That Speak for Themselves!

APPLETON POST-CRESCENT
Appleton, Wis.

"For the past three years the Post-Crescent has been a subscriber to your checking service, and we are glad to inform you that the connection has been highly satisfactory. We believe that your service solves a perplexing problem which concerns most newspapers, and that is the problem of prompt and efficient service in getting checking copies in the hands of national advertisers and agencies.

For months we have not had a single complaint from national advertisers. This speaks well for the efficiency of your service and the co-operation given your bureau in this office. We would not think of going back to the methods used previous to adopting your service."

Very truly yours,
APPLETON POST-CRESCENT, H. L. Davis, Business Manager.

Standard: I'd be willing to say for the New Bedford Standard, which is one of these small papers that everybody knows here has the intense competition of the larger city papers, like the Boston papers, thrown at it at all hours of the day, that we never hesitate to rush our material to the Associated Press. The publisher of the newspaper is a director of the Associated Press and is most insistent and always on the job that the Associated Press is covered before we are.

The basis of our competition with the metropolitan papers lies in the very elaborate and extensive system of futures and very complete coverage of our city, so we aim to have the story pretty well in our grasp before the quickest bulletin to the big cities can bring any action.

I think that the newspaper in the small town of 28,000 to 30,000 that gives adequate attention to its futures, and has a good system of local coverage so that it has men at the points where news may break, with its photographers and proper writers on the job, it can have the story pretty well told and straightened out for its editions before the metropolitan can touch it.

I believe the use of the universal desk in the small papers will mean both economy and a better edited paper. We have had a universal desk for five years now. We have a minimum of four men on it, and to take up the strain of the evening paper edition we occasionally have a fifth man. We find that the universal desk absorbs the strain, and we can put all of our resources easily and smoothly to whatever side, local or telegraph, the news strains and developments of the day are pending. We take up the slack that way. We avoid the competition between the telegraph and the local in the production of copy.

We have a regulator man to whom all copy goes which insures the proper regulation of copy. Stories go up in the way of their importance. Some men specialize in telegraph and some in local, but the copy is thrown around the desk as the needs of the day seem to demand.

E. Robert Stevenson, Waterbury Republican: May I suggest, that having seen the problem from the other end that here is something that your small town paper is confronted by—getting a small staff to deliver its stuff early. That would be a factor that would lead a small town editor to tell his men that "You must deliver your stuff first to us." They are under the pressure of time. You must get it printed early enough for your first edition to go into these cities that you are distributing in.

Mr. Harrison: May I suggest what, to me, has been the biggest advantage in Oklahoma in my experience of sending the sport copy through the universal desk—the elimination of the constant glorification of the "gutter snipe" and further the reduction, I might say, of the use of the "alley rat" adjectives, that so many people who are so-called sporting authorities are accustomed to use.

Further than that, we have managed to get those in the sporting department to have some slight consideration of the few rules that we attempt to follow in the publication of a journal in the Bible belt.

I have had one or two experiences in an attempt to develop an esprit de corps in country correspondents that might be of value to Mr. Armstead. He mentioned having some towns of 500 and up that he never pays any attention to unless he gets a date line from the Associated Press.

We have eliminated that by having one of our office assistants check every edition that we publish and every date line that we publish, and I have given to me, on the first of every month a record showing me the number of inches that we have published on every town in the state from 500 up. If a sizable town in the state, that we are interested in, has not received any considerable attention or if a correspondent has moved out without notifying us, or has taken on business interests that keep him too busy so that he cannot keep in touch with us, we immediately send someone there to get a correspondent active in looking for a feature story.

That system also provides us with ammunition against the constant criticism that we receive from ambitious Chambers of Commerce saying that some city like Podunk has received ten times the publicity that their particular town has received. They tell us that we must have a grudge against them, so they have decided to boycott us.

Then, we turn to the record and find that the city of Podunk has received 150 inches of space, and we get that record out of our file and in that way generally squelch Mr. Secretary's, of the Chamber of Commerce, complaints.

W. O. Jones, Lincoln Nebraska State Journal: I just want to ask Mr. Harrison whether that universal desk idea didn't make it unprofitable for the sport promoter to buy the sport editor?

Mr. Harrison: Yes, it did.

Mr. Jones: Can you stop that practice of sugaring the sport writers? On my way to Washington, I rode for 500 miles with the brother of a rather famous sporting man. I won't give his name or what the particular line of sport that he is engaged in is. He told me that his brother, in one year, had spent $24,000 sugaring sports writers. He told me how much of that went into my town and how much certain men had received.

I asked him if the practice was general and he said that as far as he knew it was almost universal.

I would like to know how many editors here feel that their sporting departments are beyond corruption? There are more of you than I thought.

Mr. Booth: Doesn't that suggest a very pertinent topic for discussion? That is a subject of tainted news in the sporting columns. I sympathize very much with what these gentlemen have hinted at here. I have listened at other meetings to some very virtuous editors who had great perspicuity for tainted news in connection with oil scandals.

I had personal knowledge that they were very guilty themselves in this matter of tainted news in their own sporting columns. There are sporting editors who have entangling alliances with boxers and baseball leagues in a commercial way and they are handling the news for their commercial interest. That is a very common evil in the newspaper field, and one that can be changed and ought to be changed, if you only take hold of it. I would like to see some time that subject well handled.

M. V. Atwood, Utica Observer-Dispatch: This matter of newspaper practice is one in which, we of the Observer-Dispatch at Utica, a town of about 100,000 are very much interested. Some little time ago I sent a questionnaire to all of the papers in the country in the 100,000 class, we took them roughly from 85,000 to 125,000. We made inquiry regarding some very homely matters of practice. Some 40 managing editors responded. I compiled these figures and will be glad indeed to furnish a copy to any editor interested.

STATESMEN AND PRESS UNDER MOB'S MASTERY

from a Senator's speech really convey his argument.

What would really convey his argument would be five hundred words in the correspondent's own language condensing and analyzing the Senator's remarks.

What would really instruct the public at the end of a debating day in the Senate would be a review of the arguments of the day, a summing up of the arguments of the day, with an analysis of their merits, by the correspondent himself, more or less in the manner of a dramatic critic reviewing a play.

I think we have too few such stories if we are to perform the second part of our political job—our duty to the voters.

Moreover, under the influence of the reading tastes of the mob, we often hesitate to quote from any public man unless he is really nationally known. This trait leaves many of the ablest men in the House of Representatives without national audience for their ideas.

I sometimes have heard amazingly able speeches made by obscure men in the House of Representatives. I cannot on such an occasion, however, shout to myself:

"A beat! I have just heard the best argument ever made on the subject of agricultural relief! I must hasten to a wire."

No! Except in the most exceptional circumstances it would not be news. The editor might be interested. The mob would not.

If, however, I walk by the White House grounds and I hear Calvin Coolidge muttering behind a bush and revealing his intention of growing a beard, I could infallibly make page one.

It is natural. It is human. Man cannot live by thought alone. He must also live by the emotions, simplicities, and the trivialities of life. You would not only be losing circulation but would be committing a grave attack on the nation's sanity if you dismissed trivialities and replaced them by uninterrupted solemnities.

I often wonder, nevertheless, if just a little more space could not be spared for straightaway instructive political argument stories, stories summing up our debates, stories giving both sides of an issue, stories in which your regular correspondents would write not as reporters only but as critics and publicists.

I think that the art of writing such stories ought to be practiced and developed, if we are to be effective political educators.

Whatever need may exist for such stories is not met and filled by the usual articles in our editorial columns. On the whole editorial columns, are not for exposition but for exhortation.

So we must, for impartial political instruction, turn to news columns.

Here, however, we often run into the modern theory of printing only news. Most people are interested not in thoughts but in happenings. We give them what they want and then, in self-justification, elaborate a whole great philosophy of "news" as an intellectual deity.

Our editors accordingly tend to implore us to stick to news. That is the tendency. That is the emphasis. Other things may occasionally be tolerated.

Accordingly we often arrive at the following situations:

On the one hand, back home, there is the editor, who, in the midst of trying to elect his candidates for county supervisor and settle the problem of the site of the new city hall, or writes long articles on national issues with imperfect knowledge of the background of those issues in Washington.

Meanwhile his correspondent here, is condemned to spend most of his time on the leg—exercises necessary in order to discover such nutritious slices of governmental or civic instructiveness as that somebody is going to resign or that somebody is not going to be confirmed or that the President thinks highly or does not think highly of the buying of furniture on the installment plan or that Mrs. Coolidge kept on being gracious yesterday.

I do not believe in wholesale condemnation of any tendency which is the result of large impersonal forces. The news tendency is such a tendency. It has not been created by anybody in particular and it cannot be abolished by anybody in particular. Nor should it be, in my judgment, abolished. That a newspaper should give its main attention to finding and printing news is a justified fact. I only ask, in this matter of correspondence from Washington, if it may not be possible for you to encourage the regular Washington news reporters, who knows more about the nature of this government than any other body of men existing, to take just a few more agate lines of space in your newspapers for those vivid interpretations of our government—not news—but interpretations—instructive interpretations—which they freely dispense to their hearers in their hours off duty?

I think that we specialize too much. We hire one man for news. We hire another for interpretation. I contend that the man to do the interpretation is the man who does the news.

I contend that each day, from the man who reports the World Court fight, we ought to have a few lines less of chatter about who may come out in favor of the Court and about who may possibly come out against it, and a few lines more of that man's judgment as to the nature and as to the value of the Senatorial arguments so far used and as to who the winners so far are in the dramatic combat of Senatorial minds, and why.

We have been trained to take pride in calling ourselves reporters and trained to recoil in horror from being called publicists. That fact, I think, illustrates the extremes to which the news tendency has gone. Your correspondents here, I think, ought to be proud to be—and called—publicists. Only as publicists can they accomplish their duty of politically educating the people of this country.

I realize that the mob may not like it. I ask you again to sympathize a bit with the politicians. They have their mob. It is voters. We have our mob. It is subscribers. The politicians have to consider re-election. We have to consider circulation. How can we blame them for not daring to risk losing votes if we are not willing to dare to risk losing sales?

Statesmen and journalists are partners under the modern mob's mastery.

The man who uses the expression "dirt cheap" has never been to Florida.—New York American.

WIRE PROBLEMS—INTERPRETATIVE NEWS AND ACCURATE FIGURES—BEFORE OPEN FORUM

BRIEF attention was given Saturday morning to problems of transmitting and receiving wire news. Led by Stuart H. Perry, Adrian (Mich.) Telegram, the Society discussed interpretative news, insurance of securacy in statistics, speed in getting local stories on the wire, etc. Pertinent portions of the "open forum" follow:

STUART H. PERRY, Adrian (Mich.) Telegram: These are the topics Mr. Morrison suggested under "Wire Problems": The A. P. Specials; Speeding outgoing news; What is the best method of giving wire service on your own news reports so that the other fellow gets it early, too?; Can the stock market quotations be made too accurate?; Can the unreliable special writers, the trained seals of certain metropolitan newspapers be reformed or not?; Can the wire report be made more elastic and interesting?

I am not quite sure whether the term "A. P. specials" means special stories to member papers which are put on the wire, or whether it means stories of an explanatory and interpretative character rather than spot news, or whether it means stories referring to public affairs and policies that are suggested by governmental executives. But taking any of the three definitions, my own observation is that the wires of the Associated Press are not burdened with such stories. In Michigan I am inclined to think that we could stand more rather than less of them. I think that there is danger of placing too much weight upon bare spot news. I think that an analytical or interpretative story of any event, particularly of matters political and public character, is more informative and more readable often than a story written coldly and colorlessly from the spot news standpoint.

As to speeding outgoing news, my observation is that that is purely a problem of definitely locating responsibility for the filing. The ideal arrangement would be to assign one man to that task exclusively, to let him sit in with the city editor, or state news editor, and be constantly on the watch for matters suitable for filing. That is impractical in most offices, entirely so in the medium-sized and smaller ones.

The question, "Can stock market quotations be made too accurate?" seems to me to be answerable only in one way. I think that a mistake in figures is the most serious mistake that a newspaper can make—the most serious typographical mistake, for two or three reasons.

In the first place the reader can not correct it from the context. A misplaced line, or a pied line, or misspelled word, the reader can usually correct from the context, but a mistake in figures he cannot correct.

Walter M. Harrison, Oklahoma City Oklahoman: I have a suggestion on the handling of statistical matter that might be of some value to some member.

At our staff meetings three or four times a year, we present graphic charts of the production of the country and of our State in its principal crops and minerals and devote an hour to the discussion of those figures and those crops.

Another thing that we have done that I have found of considerable value is the instilling of the idea into the minds of the news editor or the night editor, if it is his duty to pass finally upon the proofs as they come, that the figures that he sees on the proof in front of him are always wrong, and it is up to him or his assistant to go through the World Almanac, the Year Book from the Department of Agriculture, or what not, to see that the figures are right.

THE OLD WORLD PRESS AND ITS POLITICAL JOB

rom nine in the morning until eight or en or eleven at night. It was perhaps a iving wage, but it was a good average vage for that sort of work in England. Other things being equal, the difficulty of ecuring more than that would have neant so complete a dependence of the ıewspaper man upon his proprietor as to nake any initiative impossible. Now hose conditions have been bettered. The verage newspaper man in England today s better paid, stands more firmly on his eet and where on the one hand we have he dangerous tendency toward the ac-umulation of power in the hands of the roprietor, we have the contravening endency toward a new independence in he individual writer of the press. That he one offsets the other, I don't for a ıoment say, but in a measure, it does re-uce the danger.

Over in France we have a situation in hich the individual newspaper may have ower but this power does not repose pon publicity in the sense of advertising. ts sources of income are less available to ıe accountant. The average newspaper ıan is incomparably badly paid. As re-ently as 1920 I was in Paris and I knew score of men working as reporters, cor-espondents of reputable French news-apers who were receiving anywhere om 250 to 400 francs per month which ı 1920 was almost not remotely a living age. Beginning with the newspaper hose sources of income are less unpub-shable and proceeding into a condition hich underpays the individual man, you ave logically and necessarily a much reater willingness to accept the word of ommand from the official source.

I don't care to speak lengthily on the ubject of Italy. You are all as familiar ith it as I am.

Assuming that there is a political job r the newspapers whose background I ave tried to indicate, that that political b, if it means a fair playing on the rt of the middle men between Govern-ent, between the sources of conduct of ublic affairs and the individual voter, the eneral situation would seem to indicate at this would not be too well done and do not believe in general that it is too ell done.

There are, however, certain features, otably of English journalism, which I lieve with enormous advantage could duplicated here. In the paper which have the honor to represent, we of urse go much further in the verbatim porting of parliamentary debates than y American paper is ever likely to be le to do it. But we do something se on what you would describe as your ont page; we call it the bill page, op-site the editorial page, which is the ature page. We have each day a sketch the happenings in Parliament. It is ne by a man whose acquaintance with e lobby is long and intimate. It pro-des for those who do not desire to go rough the lengthy verbatim report of rliamentary discussion, a reasonably ief, sometimes wicked and always in-resting account of what has happened. collection of these brief columns as ey appear from day to day would, if ey were strung together and read as e history of the year, give a very ef-fective description, a sufficiently complete description of the operations and the manifestations of government during that year. Into these, so far as my personal knowledge goes, no influence runs, no proprietorial influence of too deep kind, certainly none whatever on my paper nor the Daily Telegraph nor the Manchester Guardian.

I am required to send from Washington material which is much more interpretative than reportive, if I may use the word. It is much more valuable to us and to our readers from our point of view, to have 100 words which (one always assumes a man endeavors to be detached and impartial in writing them) gives the atmosphere of debate, than to have a thousand words which give a report of that debate; and it is on the side of interpretative journalism and interpretative correspondence from points abroad that I generally believe the British press, the French press, the German press and the Italian press stand more or less in a class by themselves. More effective work can be done in interpretative journalism and where cable tolls are heavy it is necessary to reduce the expense. The picture which is presented to the mind of the reader and bites into the comprehension, provided always that the individual correspondent does his honest best to be fair and impartial—I can think of no better form of journalism.

All this leads back to the fact that we are, because of our situation in the world, much more interested in what we call world affairs than the people of the United States have yet been willing to admit themselves. We have produced and continue to produce a number of men whose minds and opinions or whose typewriters move with rapidity and with ease among foreign questions of considerable complexity. These men all have or should have one quality which I recommend and that is the quality which I call a background of mind. It is much more important to know, that is, for a foreign correspondent to know, the relations between the United States and the other lands of this hemisphere, the lands of the Orient and the lands of Europe, than it is to know in the most complete way all those immensely interesting statistics in the World Almanac. He may be completely ignorant of most of what appears in the World Almanac if he has a knowledge of relations between countries. Permitting him to display that background of mind in its columns is part of the political job. The encouragement of an atmosphere which admits the existence of other peoples on this earth is part of the political job, and in so far as these parts briefly mentioned are concerned, I believe the foreign press does its job reasonably well. I believe very deeply, and more deeply since I honestly like my trade or profession, that the tendency in England towards the grouping of control of newspapers in the hands of a few individuals and perhaps in the United States passage of control of newspapers from the individual to the corporation, are tendencies in the last degree dangerous.

A. P. DIRECTORS MEET JAN. 26 IN NEW YORK

Quarterly Session Scheduled with Chairmen of District Advisory Boards—Nominating Committee Will Convene Feb. 16

Directors of the Associated Press will meet in New York Jan. 26, for the regular quarterly session.

With the board members will meet chairmen of the various district advisory boards, elected under the new system, which became effective this year. They are H. J. Powell, Coffeyville (Kan.) Journal, representing the central district; J. N. Heiskell, Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette, southern district; and Richard Hooker, Springfield (Mass.) Republican, eastern district. The chairman of the western district has not yet been named.

Under the old system each district advisory board was made up arbitrarily of only five members. Now each state A. P. Editorial Association elects its own representative to the district board and these representatives name their own chairman. The chairmen meet with directors to report on conditions in their respective territories and suggest possible improvements in the service.

Directors and officers expected to attend the meeting next week are: Frank B. Noyes, Washington Star, president; E. H. Butler, Buffalo Evening News, first vice-president; C. P. J. Mooney, Memphis Commercial Appeal, second vice-president; Adolph S. Ochs, New York Times; H. V. Jones, Minneapolis Journal; B. H. Anthony, New Bedford Standard; Robert McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin; Clark Howell, Atlanta Constitution; Charles Hopkins Clark, Hartford Courant; Elbert H. Baker, Cleveland Plain Dealer; Stuart H. Perry, Adrian (Mich.) Telegram and Times; J. R. Knowland, Oakland (Calif.) Tribune.

Announcement was made this week at New York A. P. headquarters, that the association's nominating committee would meet in New York Feb. 16, to appoint candidates for election to the directorate of five members whose terms expire this year and also to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Victor F. Lawson, publisher of the Chicago Daily News. Mr. Lawson's term would have expired in 1927.

The five directors whose terms expire this year are: Mr. Noyes, Mr. Ochs, Mr. Jones, Mr. Anthony, and Mr. McLean.

Ogden M. Reid, publisher of the New York Herald Tribune is secretary of the nominating committee and H. C. Adler, Chattanooga Times, chairman. Other members are: Edward Flicker, Bridgeport (Conn.) Telegram; John S. Cohen, Atlanta Journal; P. S. McGlynn, Moline (Ill.) Dispatch; A. L. Miller, Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer and News; Frank S. Baker, Tacoma (Wash.) Daily Ledger; and Jay O. Hayes, San Jose (Cal.) Mercury-Herald.

COURT ALLOWS DAILY 60 DAY EXTENSION

Rochester Herald Granted Continuance of Receivership—Potter Alleges Unfair Competition in Petition

A sixty-day continuance of receivership of the Rochester (N. Y.) Herald, morning paper, was ordered Tuesday by Federal Judge John R. Hazel, in Federal Court at Elmira, at a hearing on the order obtained by the Queen City Printing Company, creditor, compelling receivers to show cause why the Herald properties should not be sold. Application for public sale, filed by the National Bank of Rochester, was denied. During the sixty-day extension, the receivers will try to reorganize and refinance the company.

The Herald was formerly published by Louis M. Antisdale, who died two years ago. Since last August it has been published by two receivers, John W. Baker and John W. Remington, appointed by Judge Hazel.

Counsel for the National Bank of Rochester urged the sale of the Herald, on the ground that further operations under the present order would involve losses. The move was opposed by receivers and M. Bruce Potter, president of the Herald Company.

Potter presented affidavits that national and classified advertising have increased during the receivership, but that the paper has lost $10,500 due to the falling off of local advertising, caused by alleged propaganda circulated against the newspaper, on the uncertainty of its continuance.

He estimated debts of the Herald at $465,000 and said all creditors except the National Bank of Rochester, which has a claim of $100,000, favor continuance.

All Rochester papers carried page one stories on the hearing. The Democrat used the Associated Press story and the following comment under subhead "Democrat's Policy Stated."

"The efforts of the Chronicle are devoted to extending its circulation and increasing its value to readers and advertisers by making the best paper that it knows how to make. It has no apology to offer and nothing to take back, either as regards its editorial or business policy."

SHOPPING NEWS QUITS

St. Paul Free Retail Paper Needs New Contracts to Continue

The St. Paul Shopping News, the "distribution free" publication, has seemingly landed on the rocks. It has suspended publication with the fifth number, the first having been issued Aug. 31, last. It was launched as an experiment in the extension of the retail trade. According to information gleaned from some of the participating members, the cause of suspension was the necessity of writing new contracts.

It is stated that the project has not been abandoned for good, but that the fact that the first arrangement entered into by the advertisers was not on a compulsory basis made the income of the publication uncertain from month to month, and that the pro rata cost had been higher than was anticipated at the beginning.

The Shopping News has been circulated among more than 100,000 families, all outside of the city limits but within a radius of 150 miles. This experiment in the extension of retail trade was made on the initiative of St. Paul merchants who were under the impression that their sales could by this means be increased to a volume unattainable by the ordinary methods of advertising.

MOORE SPEAKS IN BOSTON

Gives Principal Address at Meeting of New England Dailies

Thomas H. Moore, associate director of the bureau of advertising, American Newspaper Publishers' Association, spoke before the New England Daily Newspaper Association at its mid-winter meeting at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, Boston, Jan. 19. In his talk he told of the work of his bureau and what it is attempting to accomplish. He compared the advantage of newspaper advertising with that of magazines. At a round table discussion which followed his address, Mr. Moore both asked questions of the publishers present, and replied to various queries put to him.

Luncheon in the Swiss room of the hotel preceded the business session. Two new papers were received into membership, the Waterville (Me.) Sentinel and Concord (N. H.) Telegram. George F. Booth, publisher of the Worcester Telegram and Gazette, was elected a member of the board of governors to succeed Theodore T. Ellis, former publisher of those papers.

NATIONAL COMMISSION IN TOLEDO MEET

Delegates to Hear President of Willys-Overland Company Among Other Speakers at Annual Gathering Jan. 26-27—Newspaper Dinner

John N. Willys, president of the Willys-Overland Company, will be among speakers at the annual meeting of the National Commission of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World at Toledo, O., Jan. 26-27. Delegates will be guests at a luncheon at the automobile firm's plant Tuesday.

A feature of the convention will be a dinner for commission members, to be given by Toledo newspapers at the Hotel Secor, Jan. 26. Grove Patterson, managing editor of the Toledo Blade, will preside.

Speakers at a luncheon scheduled for Wednesday include C. K. Woodbridge, A. A. C. W. president; Joseph Deutsch, president, National Association of Employing Lithographers; and Bennett Chapple, director of publicity, American Rolling Mills Company. W. Frank McClure, chairman of the commission, will preside.

Topics scheduled for discussion at business sessions include, "What Advertising Men Are Doing to Make Advertising Pay Better," led by Frank T. Carroll, Indianapolis (Ind.) News, and president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives; and the proposed revision of the commission's constitution and by-laws, led by George F. Burbach, general manager of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

A report on the new financing plan of the A. A. C. W. will be made, including a report of a special committee from the National Commission.

Rowe Stewart, Philadelphia Record; H. H. Charles, New York; Charles R. Frederickson, Coshocton, O., and Guy W. Cook, Chicago, are slated to report on plans for the forthcoming annual A. A. C. W. convention to be held next June in Philadelphia.

The meeting of the commission will be followed by the annual convention of the Fifth District of the A. A. C. W.

Total Production 1,530,318 Tons During Year, But Was 4,000 Tons Under 1924 Figure, News Print Bureau Reports

More news print was produced in the United States than in Canada during the year 1925, according to a bulletin just issued by the News Print Service Bureau. The total actual tons produced in the United States were 1,530,318, whereas Canada rolled up a total of 1,522,217. United States production fell off for the period, against 1924, about 4,000 tons; Canada produced about 3,000 tons more last year than in 1924.

The total production of news print for the United States and Canadian mills for the 12 months period is stated as 3,052,535, compared with the 1924 figure of 3,059,495. The bulletin says:

"Stocks of news print paper at United States mills totaled 16,238 tons at the end of December and at Canadian mills 18,414 tons, making a combined total of 34,652 tons which was equivalent to 3.2 days' average production. During December the United States mills operated at 94.4 per cent of capacity and the Canadian mills at 99.0 per cent. The news print mills also made 1,968 tons of hanging paper in December, 594 tons of which were made in Canada.

"Comparing production during the year of 1925 with the same period of each of the five previous years, the United States mills made 3 per cent more than in 1924, and 3 per cent more than in 1923, 6 per cent more than in 1922; 25 per cent more than in 1921 and 1 per cent more than in 1920; the Canadian mills produced 12 per cent more than in 1924, 20 per cent more than in 1923, 41 per cent more than in 1922, 88 per cent more than in 1921 and 74 per cent more than in 1920.

"The combined production of United States and Canadian mills for year 1925 was 8 per cent more than 1924, 11 per cent over 1923, 21 per over 1922, 50 per cent over 1921, 28 per cent over 1920."

Imports of news print from countries other than Canada and Newfoundland for 11 months in 1925, totaled 124,96

PRINTERS, PUBLISHERS & ADVERTISERS CELEBRATE FRANKLIN'S BIRTHDAY

C. King Woodbridge, A. A. C. W. President, Tells of "Poor Richard's" Contribution to Newspapers of Today—Organizations Lay Wreaths on Park Row Statue

PRINTERS, newspaper and advertising men of the nation paid tribute over the week-end to Benjamin Franklin, their patron saint, whose 220th birthday anniversary fell Jan. 17.

C. K. Woodbridge

Representing organized advertising generally, C. King Woodbridge, president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, delivered an address on "The Advertising Clubs' Interest in Benjamin Franklin," which was broadcast by station WGY of the General Electric Company.

In New York numerous organizations laid wreaths on the Franklin statue in Park Row. Among them were the International Benjamin Franklin Society, the Benjamin Franklin Memorial Committee of the Sons of the American Revolution, the New York Employing Printers' Association, Typographical Union Number Six, the New York Club of Printing House Craftsmen and the Advertising Club of New York.

The Poor Richard Club of Philadelphia held its celebration of the anniversary with a "trade-mark" dinner on Jan. 18.

Speaking of Franklin and his Pennsylvania Gazette, Mr. Woodbridge said in part:

"Franklin excluded the slander and personal abuse from his columns and demonstrated that a newspaper could prosper on the policy of performing a service to its subscribers, and even assume a proper responsibility to its readers in the kind of advertising it accepted.

"This was as rare an experiment in the field of publishing as was his kite experiment in the field of electrical discoveries. The accepted belief among publishers was that a newspaper was like a stage coach on which anyone had a right to a seat if they would pay for it.

"Franklin felt, however, that he owed an obligation to his subscribers, and he could not print abuse, as he stated it, without doing them a manifest injustice.

"'I offer my advice on this,' says Franklin, 'as a caution to young publishers, that they might be encouraged not to pollute their presses and disgrace their profession by such infamous practices.'

"Let us bear in mind that that was a most extraordinary viewpoint for a publisher to take at that time. So far as I can learn, he was the first American publisher to so state the publisher's responsibility to his readers with reference to the kind of advertising which he might with propriety accept.

"I am glad to say that the great majority of newspaper, magazine and periodical, business paper, agricultural paper, directory and theatre program publishers of the present day, under the banner of organized advertising, are conducting their business on this policy of fair-play to the reader laid down by Franklin.

"I am sure we all agree that Franklin had great gifts as a man of letters and philosopher to have made a world's best seller and a classic of literature out of an almanac.

"Like many of my advertising friends who deal so much in the use of words and study for means of effective expression in their advertising copy, Franklin had a fine sense of word values. We have the copy of a lengthy letter he wrote at one time to Noah Webster, applauding his zeal in preserving the purity of the English language. However, so fluid is our language and so constant are its changes to meet new conditions and new demands, that most of the words which Franklin noted as new in American speech upon his return from his long stay in France, and which he then deplored, are now in our accepted speech.

"His conception of what constitutes a good piece of writing might well be studied by the writer of advertising copy in this day. He said:

"'The words should be the most expressive that the language affords, provided that they are the most generally understood. Nothing should be expressed in two words that can as well be expressed in one; that is, no synonyms should be used, or very rarely; but the whole should be as short as possible, consistent with clearness; the words should be placed as to be agreeable to the ear in reading; summarily, it should be smooth, clear and short, for the contrary qualities are displeasing.'"

"There is a striking parallel in the things that Franklin advocated and those things which organized advertising is emphasizing today," Mr. Woodbridge concluded.

"He believed in and practiced industry, which was a foundation stone upon which all his success was built. So do we, today. He believed in fair play in business. We advocate accuracy and truth of statement in advertising and in all business dealings. He insisted that the craftmanship of his business as a printer and publisher should be a model for all others. A large portion of the time in our advertising club meetings is spent in considering ways and means of improving the skill with which we do our work. Franklin saw the value of developing and fostering a community spirit. We have that spirit in our clubs today. He believed in the Round Table. This is the thing which makes membership in an advertising club of definite value. He believed in the use of every legitimate means at hand that gave opportunity for the dissemination of knowledge: the press, the pamphlet, the circulating library, and agencies of that sort which have their counterpart in the more extensive channels of publicity as we know them today.

"As Minister to France, Franklin cemented bonds of friendship between that country and our own which have grown stronger year by year. He believed, as we believe today, that nations will very likely get along happily together, providing they maintain close relations of understanding between one another. This was the key-note of our great International Advertising Convention in London in 1924, and I trust will be the dominant note of every great international business convention in the years to come.

"Ten years ago, the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World held its Twelfth Annual Convention in the buildings of the University of Pennsylvania—founded by Benjamin Franklin—at Philadelphia. The hosts to that convention were the members of the Poor Richard Club, which is the Advertising Club of Philadelphia. We commemorated that event by the publication of a book on Benjamin Franklin—Printer, written by John Clyde Oswald, president of the Benjamin Franklin Society of America and a prominent leader in our organization.

"We are holding our twenty-second annual international advertising convention in June of this year, meeting again at the University of Pennsylvania. In the ten-year interval the Association has become a world organization.

"I know of no finer thing which we as advertising men and women could do at that time than to dedicate our best efforts as individuals and as an Association to these great principles of business so effectively enunciated and practiced by Benjamin Franklin."

Editor & Publisher Year Book—next week. It will contain all the old features and many new ones of value to the newspaper and advertising men of the world. For the first time it will list newspapers of all civilized nations.

To Install Newsprint Machines

In connection with new financing just completed by the Port Alfred Pulp and Paper Corporation, Port Alfred, Que., announcement is made that the first of two newsprint machines being installed will be in operation by May 1 and the second by Sept. 1. Up to the present time the company has been exclusively a pulp producer, with capacity of 50,000 tons per annum. Upon completion of its present construction program it will have a rated annual production of 67,500 tons of newsprint. Its plant is located on tidewater on the Saguenay River.

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

CONSIDERABLE space in this periodical has been devoted to the series of articles which Don C. Seitz is publishing in The Outlook. The installment inserted in the issue for January 20 is devoted to the tabloid press and is entitled "Guttersniping." The article is a sort of "fudge" which takes up the radio and its influence upon the American public.

The conclusions reached by Mr. Seitz are summed up in the following paragraphs:

Meanwhile the tabloid takes the place of ultra-sensationalism in type. It is a contest between weeds for the most room in the gutter. I do not say this in any special spirit of disgust. Enlightenment, however crude, is better than none at all. The great foreign population of the cities can learn from pictures what they would find it difficult to absorb from type. Much of it they would probably be as well off without knowing. The Japanese are credited with visualizing everything and being insensible to text and tone. We are fast approaching that state in America.

In this matter of visualized news the movies have impinged upon the newspaper. The celerity with which current events are transferred to the screen is a lesson to editors, if it is heeded. It is also notable that the movie audiences appreciate them. They are roundly applauded and are often strikingly good, affording far more satisfaction than the mangled bulletins that come over the radio.

THE literary editor of a newspaper ought not to feel cramped in the preperation of his copy and should be free to print the truth as he sees it. But he, too, can hear from his readers, as Stuart Sherman, editor of the Book Section of the New York Herald Tribune, proves in his contribution to McNaught's Monthly for February.

Mr. Sherman quotes one of his critics as saying. "Truth is dangerous. Truth is contagious. Truth is shocking and subversive. For God's sake, tell us anything you like but the truth."

THE magazine section of the Kansas City Star for Sunday, January 10, contained a personality sketch of Melville E. Stone, the dean of American newspaper men. Its author is Labert St. Clair.

THE title, "Released for Publication," (Houghton Mifflin Company) by Oscar King Davis, for many years Washington correspondent for the New York Times, certainly has a newspaper twang. Its title page promises "inside political history of Theodore Roosevelt and his times." In making good this promise Mr. Davis releases some inside press history of a number of leading newspapers.

Mr. Davis opens his volume with an anecdote in which he relates that while reading copy of the New York Sun one night the cable from Havana reported that the commission investigating the Maine explosion would report that the ship had been blown up from the outside. He knew what that meant. When he went to the office of the Sun on the night before his next night off he took his grip with him. As soon as work at the copy desk was done he took the train for Washington to see Roosevelt, then Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

From Roosevelt Davis obtained a promise of a letter of introduction to the fleet commander in case of war. That is how he got his war assignment from Chester S. Lord, managing editor of the Sun. But his war story is short.

Other big assignments are described by Mr. Davis somewhat in detail. In chatting about the way he covered the Haywood trial he pays this hemarkable tribute to Carr Van Anda of the Times:

In 35 years of active newspaper work, which has taken me around the world and into four wars, and has given me an acquaintance with scores of newspaper men, Carr Van Anda, of the New York Times, is the greatest managing editor I have ever met. He knows the news, and how to get it, and how to print it. And he will print it as it comes, whether the "after-breakfast" men, who write the editorials, like it or not. They can say what they please in their editorial columns. But editorial news and editorial views keep out of the news columns under his jurisdiction.

When Mr. Davis was appointed chief of the Washington Bureau of the New York Times his first story to his paper was written on material furnished by Roosevelt and drew a $500,000 libel suit from William Randolph Hearst. The suit never came to trial and the reason may possibly be found in the chapter describing the incident. By a curious coincidence this chapter is number XIII.

The chapter which tells how Davis got a beat from Borah on the Taft platform is one of the best things that has appeared in type about covering a national political convention. It sheds an interesting sidelight upon the interest taken in the news columns by Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of the Times.

William Bayard Hale and his famous, or his infamous, interview with the German Kaiser gets a chapter—but with the best stuff left out. In connection with this incident Roosevelt speaks confidentially to Davis about the Kaiser's connection with the Venezuelan affair and requests Davis to explain the situation to Charles R. Miller, who was then editor-in-chief of the Times. It seems that Roosevelt had noticed some editorial about the affair in the Times and he wanted Mr. Miller to have the full information. In spite of what critics are now saying about the editorial page, it would look as though a few people glanced at what appeared on that page.

In view of what has been printed recently about Washington correspondents the chapter which deals with Taft and his relations with newspaper men may be read to advantage. A matter of great moment to the public is thus succinctly set forth by Mr. Davis:

There is sharp differentiation between newspaper work in Washington and elsewhere by reason of this fact, for the correspondents there very rarely are obliged to pry into private, personal affairs. They are dealing most of the time with business that is wholly public, or should be. Of course, diplomatic affairs are in a class by themselves, because that is the habit and rule of all the world, and no one country can break it down, despite Mr. Wilson's passionate plea for "open covenants, openly arrived at." The preparation of cases for enforcement of the law must also be closely guarded lest there be premature publication that helps to a miscarriage of justice. But outside of those two classes there is very little Government business about which any Government official has a right to maintain secrecy. Yet a great many officials habitually treat the work that goes over their desks as if it were their own private affair, and seem to resent the simplest inquiry about the most trivial matter.

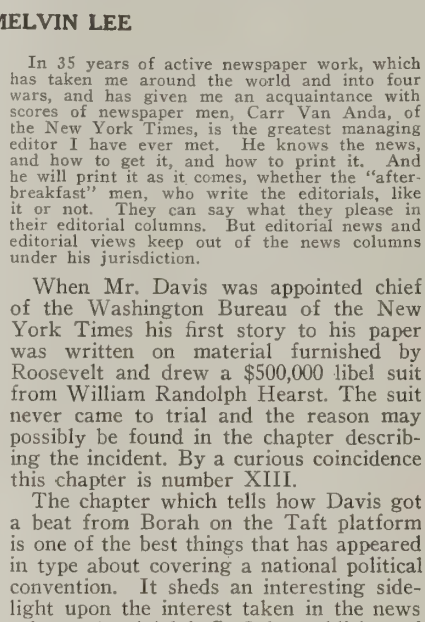
Chapter XXIV—I am only mentioning those of special interest to newspaper men—deals with Roosevelt as a great news-maker and as a great news-giver. When asked for certain facts about the Panama canal that must come from the State Department Roosevelt replied:

"I hate to do that, O. K.; Elihu always makes such a row with me when I go after the facts about anything he is handling, especially if subsequently any of those facts happen to find their way into the newspapers."

On another occasion, described in the same chapter, Davis knew the contents of a special message to the Senate. He was warned to look out or the Associated Press would fine the Times heavily for premature publication of a document delivered in advance and under confidence until released. As he knew the message had not yet been delivered to the Associated Press, he had his chief, Van Anda, of the Times, notify the 'A.P.' that the Times would decline in advance to receive a copy of it. In this way the Times was not bound by the confidence under which the Associated Press received the message and had its "beat" without incurring a fine for premature publication. The incident is described in detail on page 123.

Chapter XXVII tells of a tentative offer made to Roosevelt to edit one of the great New York City newspapers. Chapter XXVIII aims to show that Roosevelt had a sense of humor. It deals with the famous Associated Press dispatch from Peru, "I and my people thank you," sent in the name of Roosevelt in reply to a message of felicitation cabled by President Pardo when the battleship fleet in its cruise around the world called at Callao, Peru. Calling the Washington correspondents together Roosevelt said he had something so good that he simply had to tell it to them but they must not print it. Here is what Davis says in the chapter:

Of course we promised. There was no help for that, and the President went on. "You know that I and my people telegram that all the newspapers are roasting me about," he said. "Well, I never saw that message. Old Adee did that to me. And now I can't say a word about it, for then old Pardo would know I hadn't answered his telegram to me!"



Old Adee, as is doubtless well-known, was then Second Assistant Secretary of State. Of his work Davis quotes Roosevelt as saying:

Why, there isn't a kitten born in a palace anywhere on earth that I don't have to write a letter of congratulation to the peripatetic Tom cat that might have been its sire, and old Adee does that for me!

Another newspaper chapter is XXXV. It tells how the New York Times prevented Knox's resignation as Secretary of State. With apologies to Roosevelt it is a bully good story.

A story that literally beats the band will be found in chapter LIV. It tells how George Henry Payne, then on the New York Evening Mail, hired a band—and kept on hiring bands for the Chicago convention. But who paid for these bands? For the answer see the book. It is a good story.

UPHOLDS CRIME NEWS

Whitman Tells Lawyers It Is Greatest Weapon Against Lawlessness

Too much newspaper publicity cannot be given to crime, acording to Charles S. Whitman, former governor of New York. As chairman of the law-enforcement committee of the American Bar Association and member of the National Crimes Commission, organized to conduct a nationwide study of the criminal situation in this country, Mr. Whitman has been devoting much time to the subject. He summarized his conclusions recently in an address before the midwinter session of the American Bar Association executive committee in Los Angeles.

"Newspaper publicity is the most powerful weapon that can be used in the war on crime," former Governor Whitman declared. "I am well aware that the press of the country is sometimes criticised for publishing so many crime stories, because it is thought that these have a tendency to spread the suggestion of crime among people who may be adversely influenced thereby. I admit that there may be some basis for this opinion.

"But in my view, the benefits that flow from the publicity on crime far exceed the evils. I believe the public has a right to know of the crimes that are committed and also of the steps taken by the authorities for the apprehension of criminals and the enforcement of the laws generally."

In the opinion of Mr. Whitman, the increasing volume of crime—or what is popularly called the crime wave—results directly from the apathy of the general public toward law enforcement and the affairs of government in general. In this connection he declared that government and law enforcement are only as good as the people want them. In the last analysis, it is the people who determine what shall be done.

Edward T. O'Loughlin, editor of the Brooklyn section of the New York Evening Journal, will begin publication in about three weeks of the Lynbrook (L. I.) Post, a weekly newspaper, which he hopes subsequently to bring into the daily field.

E. T. O'Loughlin

At present he is installing equipment in a plant he has purchased at Lynbrook. The equipment consists of a Model "E" Duplex, three Intertypes, a Ludlow, and job presses.

Mr. O'Loughlin has been with the Evening Journal for the past six years. He was Park Commissioner of Brooklyn until the first of this year, and before that was deputy Market Commissioner. He also served three terms as Kings County Registrar.

In Lynbrook he is president of the Mariland Land Company.

He expects to retain his position with the Evening Journal and engage an editor and manager to conduct the weekly. Lynbrook is in Nassau county about 16 miles from the Pennsylvania station, New York.

Changes on Connecticut Daily

Harold Van Liew has joined the staff of the South Norwalk (Conn.) Evening Sentinel as assistant to Wendell P. Milligan, treasurer. He has had newspaper experience for about ten years; the last ten years he has been a salesman for the Mergenthaler Linotype Company and the Intertype Corporation. Alfred S. O'Brien has joined the staff of the Evening Sentinel as managing editor. Mr. O'Brien has been with the Bridgeport Herald and other Bridgeport papers for the last 15 years. He succeeds David A. Morrissey, formerly of the New York Globe.

Daily Awards Art Prizes

Sixty-two artists exhibited in this year's St. Louis Post-Dispatch Black and White competition for St. Louis scenes, as against 36 in the first annual contest a year ago, and there were 171 pieces on display, as compared with 139 a year ago. Fred Conway's pencil sketch of Union Station and neighboring buildings at Eighteenth and Market streets won the first prize of $250. The second prize of $100 was won by O. E. Berninghaus with a pencil sketch of Broadway and Market street, and $50, third prize, was won by C. K. Gleason.

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

Rankin's Memories of Munsey

To Editor & Publisher: I read with great deal of interest your life story of William T. Dewart in last week's Editor & Publisher.

I met Mr. Dewart on my first trip to New York as Advertising Manager of the Bobbs Merrill Magazines, Indianapolis, Ind., in 1907. Thereafer I never came to New York unless I called on Mr. Dewart. He has helped more young men, as he did me, in the Munsey organization and other organizations, than any other man I know. Through him it was my great pleasure to meet and know Mr. Munsey. Always thereafter when I called on Mr. Dewart, he made the suggestion "Why don't you go in and see 'the Chief'," and I always did. That is why I happened to know, respect and admire Mr. Munsey.

In 1917, Mr. Munsey offered to make me publisher of the New York Sun, with the understanding that he would make it possible for me to own "The Sun". I knew, however, that the offer was really suggested by my friend, W. T. Dewart.

After thorough consideration, Mr. Munsey and I both agreed that if I had not changed the name of the Mahin Advertising Co., to the Wm. H. Rankin Co., my best opportunity would have been with Mr. Munsey. But I remember, he advised me: "Rankin, you cannot afford to leave a business that has had you name because you have three sons coming along, and I am going to live a long time". Since I moved to New York the friendship of Mr. Munsey and Mr. Dewart has meant a great deal to me.

When the advertising men arranged the Welcome to New York Dinner, Mr. Dewart told me that while Mr. Munsey would like to attend, he had just bought the New York Herald and was working night and day, hence he could not be with us. However, with his characteristic helpfulness, Mr. Dewart said, "Why don't you telephone Mr. Munsey and ask him to come". I did. I told him what it would mean to me to have him there. He said, "Rankin, I haven't gone to an advertising dinner for years, but if it will help you I will be there."

So Mr. Munsey came and sat at the Speakers' table, next to Secretary of Labor J. J. Davis. They had never met before. Mr. Munsey liked Secretary Davis immediately and his columns ever after that were open to the Secretary of Labor or to J. J. Davis, head of the order of the Moose. Just the other day Secretary of Labor Davis wrote me and said:

"In the death of Frank Munsey our country has lost a noble citizen, and you and I a good friend. I presume you saw my tribute to him in the New York papers."

When the advertising men gave C. H. Stoddart the dinner last Sept. 21, it was my great pleasure to accompany Mr. Munsey, Mr. Hodges and Mr. Friendly to Chicago on the 20th Century.

A week before the dinner, I suggested to Mr. Dewart that it would be a fine compliment to C. H. Stoddart to have Mr. Munsey use a full page advertisement in all the Chicago papers advertising the New York Sun signed by Mr. Munsey and by Mr. Stoddart as Western Manager. Mr. Munsey said to Mr. Dewart "I have never signed anything but 'The Sun's' name to Sun advertising but if it will be helpful to Mr. Stoddart, O. K.", and so the ads appeared.

I never knew two men to work so closely and so intimately as Mr. Munsey and Mr. Dewart and I knew all the time Mr. Munsey felt entire confidence in Mr. Dewart's ability to manage and direct all the Munsey properties.

He told me on one occasion he considered Mr. Dewart by far the best Business Executive and Newspaper Director in the Country.

And from my own experience, in meeting and knowing business executives and publishers, I know of no man who is William T. Dewart's superior. Under his direction, The Sun, The Telegram, the Munsey Magazines, the Munsey Trust Company and the Mohican Co. will continue to grow and prosper.

And one of the main reasons they will do so is because William T. Dewart has the confidence of the big men of this country, the business men of New York and most of all he has the confidence of the men who have grown up in these organizations under his personal direction. Their loyalty plus Mr. Dewart's great ability to direct them will make all the Munsey properties go ahead even to a larger degree of success than if Mr. Munsey was still with us.

William T. Dewart is a worthy successor to Frank Munsey.

Sincerely your friend,
Wiliam H. Rankin.

Neglect of Coal Strike

To Editor & Publisher: Here's three hearty cheers for you and your views on the flaccid neglect of news opportunity in the coal strike.

Nobody, with the possible exception of those actually engaged in it knows what the strike is all about.

Even the Government solemnly accepts a report showing that an amazing number of miners apparently only work a week or two during a normal year, without considering the possibility that what the statistics show as one man working 2 per cent of the year and another working 98 per cent, may in reality be the same man working 2 per cent of the year in one mine and 98 per cent in another.

Who gathers the record of asthma in the mines? Who makes a comparative study of why, with virtually the same minimum wage, Henry Ford and Endicott-Johnson have no strikes and the mine operators have 'em every two years?

If some editors could hear some of the bitter things I've heard said about the newspapers' attitude in connection with the coal strike—honest they wouldn't believe! It isn't building a particle of good will for the press at large. I can tell you that.

Sincerely,
Philip Francis Nowlan.

No Datelines on This Daily

McAlester, Okla.,
Jan. 13.

To Editor & Publisher: We quite agree with Max Hahn of the Toledo Blade as to "useless datelines," and especially as we have for several years omitted date lines on telegraph stories.

The News-Capital is an evening paper, not in the "metropolitan" class, but having leased wire reports of the Associated Press.

It comes to our notice that the La Crosse (Wis.) Tribune, which I look over daily as a "valued subscriber," also omits date lines. There may be others.

There have been but few criticisms of this plan—one subscriber brought in a newspaper having the date lines one day, to "show you how it is done," but when we proved that he was the gainer through omission of this superfluous type, he appeared satisfied.

Fred G. Cowles,
News-Capital Company.

Saving Space

To Editor & Publisher: Since the appearance of my letter to you on useless datelines I have received copies of two papers which for some time have been following the dateline style which I advocated. The papers are the McAlester (Okla.) News-Capital and the LaCrosse (Wis.) Tribune. The editors of those papers probably know better than anyone the amount of space to be saved from elimination of the date on each story.

Very truly yours,
Max Hahn,
The Toledo Blade.

Every Thousand Counts

To Editor & Publisher: We note in the linage tabulation in your issue of Jan. 16 that you quoted the Akron Beacon Journal as having carried during the year 1925, 14,476,071, whereas the correct figure is 14,477,071.

This would be of little importance, if it were not for the fact that we are carrying in your next issue a half-page advertisement, in which we state that we carried 14,477,071 lines.

If you feel that we are entitled to a correction, we would greatly appreciate you[r] tioning in the issue in which our h[ead] appears, that the linage was incorrectly [re]ported in your issue of Jan. 16.

PROSPERITY IS PART OF

NEW ENGLAND

Following a highly successful year New England has kept right on going. For the first few weeks of the present year industrial and trade achievements exceed in many respects the record for the similar period of 1925.

Wholesalers have completed inventories, salesmen are on their filling in trip, jobbers are up on their toes and earnest preparations are under way for a big spring and summer trade.

Retailers have cleared their shelves of overstocked lines by the seasonable clearance sales, which have been unusually effective.

Prices have been steady. There is plenty of work in sight in industrial establishments. The agricultural districts indicate increased buying power and savings bank deposits have increased, bespeaking a greater purchasing power on the part of the public in general. There is an evident tendency to make purchases for future needs. The numbers of retail buyers have increased and the demands are for a greater variety of commodities.

In all this there is more than evidence of prosperity—there is positive assurance of it. The National Advertiser who neglects this field in his campaign for the current year closes his door on a volume of business, in a compact territory, that means much to him—or to his competitor.

Get the territorial details from the New England daily newspapers, they will cooperate with you in merchandising this potential market.

"ROLLING SNOWBALLS"

Distributers of Baltimore Sun Hold 16th Annual Banquet

The Sun Route Owners Association, Baltimore, held its 16th annual banquet Jan. 20. The menu was decorated with a big Snowball not labelled, representing the circulation of the "Sunpapers," being rolled by a boy representing the spirit of Sun service.

The menu also carried a poem by Henry Edward Warner, member of the Baltimore Sun staff, and author of "Songs of the Craft," which appeared in EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Entitled "Rolling Snowballs," one verse was as follows:

"The bigger she grew the harder we pushed,
Straining to make her go,
And every inch was a triumph to us
Who watched our Snowball grow!
We rolled her up and we rolled her down
Over the white-garbed lawn,
Till she was as big as a house, and all
The snow on the place was gone!"

Advertisers in

INDIANA

Direct Their Message to the Home

Conditions in Indiana have improved considerably in the past generation. Prosperity is state wide—and in considering prosperity we are no longer led to think of a favored few. The wealth of the State, derived mostly through industrial and agricultural channels, is distributed sufficiently to assure merchandise distributors of a general demand for luxuries as well as for foodstuffs and other necessities.

The educational standard of Indiana is high and the people are thoughtful, discerning buyers, well worth the careful consideration of manufacturers.

In keeping with the attractive purchasing power of this important territory, the National Advertiser is assured the cooperation of daily newspapers that rank high among the newspapers of the country.

WILLIAM E. TAYLOR

St. Louis Post-Dispatch Veteran Dies After Leap from Bridge

William E. Taylor, 64, classified advertising director of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and connected with the business office of that paper for more than 46 years, wandered from his home on the morning of Jan. 18 while suffering from mental aberration, and leaped into the Mississippi River from the Municipal Bridge. Although still alive when taken from the river by the crew of a tug, he died soon afterward from shock and exposure.

Mr. Taylor suffered the recurrence of a nervous illness experience in 1911, and had been confined to his home since last October.

Mr. Taylor entered the employ of the Post-Dispatch as a collector in 1879, when it was personally directed by the late Joseph Pulitzer. He was elected secretary of the Pulitzer Publishing Company in 1906, but retired from that position in 1911 because of illness. Since his return he had been in charge of "want ads."

SAN MATEO DAILIES MERGED

FINDLAY COURIER SOLD

Heminger Brothers of Morning Republican Buy Controlling Interest

R. L. and L. N. Heminger, editor and business manager of the Findlay (O.) Morning Republican, have bought the controlling interest of H. W. Brown, in the Findlay Daily Courier, and have already assumed possession of the property.

The Courier is in its 90th year and is the oldest Findlay newspaper, having started as a weekly in 1836. For a number of years, however, it has ranked second in the field in circulation and advertising linage.

Continuation of both newspapers under one management is contemplated. Plans, however, have not been completely developed.

Mr. Brown was the Courier's editor and proprietor for 25 years. He has in view a western trip shortly.

The Hemingers have had complete charge of the Findlay Republican for more than two years, assuming that responsibility when their father, I. N. Heminger, went to California for the benefit of Mrs. Heminger's health. The family owns a controlling interest in the Republican. The father has been identified with the Republican for 35 years, having started as a reporter after being graduated from college.

DAILY ISSUES SURVEY

Cleveland Press Booklet Seeks to Analyze Local Field

A large booklet "Comparing the Selling Power of Cleveland Newspapers" has recently been issued by the Cleveland Press containing house-to-house surveys of various sections of the city.

The survey was suggested, the book states, by an executive of a large advertising agency in another city, and was carried out by two students of Carroll University, James E. Slivka and Val J. Mastny. They were instructed to ask, but suggest no answers to the following questions:

1. Which Cleveland newspaper do you take?
2. Which do you like best?
3. Which do you read most carefully?
4. In which newspaper does the advertising influence you most?
5. Is any buying for your home done at community markets?

The survey is presented by districts just as it was made with charts and graphs used profusely to illustrate conditions as found by the investigators.

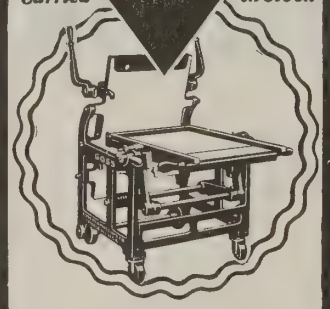
BASKETBALL PLAY-BY-PLAY



Madison (Wis.) State Journal Pioneering in Sport Reporting

Play by play reports of basketball games, consuming more than two columns in length, are being published experimentally by the Madison (Wis.) State Journal on its sport pages. These detailed reports are said never to have been attempted before. Sport editors from many parts of the country are watching the innovation.

The play by play is obtained by having a court reporter present to whom the sport editor dictates plays as they are made on the floor.

BUSINESS TICKLERS

HERE'S an idea that might prove profitable to the various newspapers about the country where the same condition arises. The Travelers Insurance Company, WTIC of Hartford, Conn., has established on their radio programs "Community Nights." On these respective nights, the Chamber of Commerce of one selected city is invited to furnish the program. "Meriden Night" was set for Jan. 15, and on the Wednesday prior to that Friday, the Meriden Record used a double page spread, with cuts of all the artists participating, arranged across the top of the two pages. The balance of the pages, beneath the program and publicity, was sold to radio dealers.—W. C. Smith.

What do you know about title insurance? Do you know that when you buy a property, you can guarantee that the title is absolutely clear? A lot of readers fail to have this knowledge and it is sometimes costly. That is why you ought to be able to induce some title insurance firms to carry a series of advertising in your columns—B. A. T.

In a part page ad running daily, with a head entitled "Timely Tips Toward Thrift," the Milwaukee Leader runs one or two inch ads of hardware, shoe dealers, meat markets, etc., establishments that are too small to advertise extensively. These ads are also classified according to the streets and various neighborhoods in the city and produce revenue that is often overlooked.—W. Polson, Milwaukee.

To impress upon readers and advertisers the extent of your circulation, compare city circulation with the number of wired homes in your city.—D. Simons.

While some department stores make out their advertising budgets in August others do so in February. Find out when the stores in your city make their budgets and then send them a four- or eight-page folder featuring the amount that various departments should spend for news paper advertising according to such authorities as L. D. Herrold and Robert Ramsey. The figures may be found on page 35 of Herrold's "Advertising for the Retailer" and also in Ramsey's "Constructive Merchandising." A very complete outline is also found on page 889 of Daniel Starch's "Principles of Advertising." Starch classifies expenditures by morning, evening and Sunday newspapers.—Norman J. Radder, Bloomington, Ind.

Are your big stores telling the public enough about their business, or merely advertising their values? Here are some subjects which would make interesting reading and serve as general promotion copy: A list of the "best sellers" for the past week, the six best during the past six months, the colors most in demand by women buyers during a recent period, the average amount of purchase by morning shoppers and by afternoon shoppers, the number of men who made purchases in women's departments during the past week, the number of women who made purchases in men's departments, the busiest shopping hours and the quietest ones, etc. One such subject a day, properly handled, would make interesting reading, and such a series would be closely followed.—V. M. K.

PLAN ADVERTISING TAX

Texas Scheme Provides Publicity Districts and Official Levy

An unusual plan to finance an organized advertising campaign for the Lower Rio Grande Valley region of Texas is shaping itself, with endorsements of numerous interested organizations. It is proposed to organize a publicity district, somewhat on the order of a road or school district, and to vote a tax, not to exceed two mills on the $1 property valuation, the money—$50,000 or more—thus raised to provide a Valley advertising fund. It will be necessary first to obtain passage of a bill permitting formation of the proposed district.

Brownsville and Harlingen chambers of commerce were first to approve the plan. Then similar endorsement was given by the San Benito chamber and by a gathering of Valley shippers and business men which met to seek the 1927 fruit jobbers' convention for the Valley.

coholic minimum thermometer, and rain and snow gauge.

Thus the newspaper has at all times curate information concerning temperat and precipitation. The paper prints daily weather story and each month r a story reviewing the weather of the p vious month. "The venture has pro entirely successful and we recommend to other papers," says W. Earl Hall, m aging editor.—Norman J. Radder, U versity of Indiana, Bloomington, Ind.

A search through the dusty old regist of Milwaukee's most prominent hotel g the Milwaukee Wisconsin News a co ing good feature story recently. T names of famous men, living and de who had visited the hotel were duplica by an expert pen artist, and a cut m of the signatures. A story was writ on these men, some of whom were me bers of European royalty, together wit second cut of the pretty clerk at the ho —Ruben Levin, Madison, Wis.

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

A DAILY feature, for four weeks, at the bottom of page 1, under the heading: "The Traffic Cop Says," created considerable interest among readers of the Waterloo (Ia.) Evening Courier. Art of a traffic cop with hand outstretched was used. Six or eight word summaries of municipal traffic code provisions were run in large type.—Burton T. Burritt.

A small city daily with a sizable circulation makes a practice of donating all books and magazines submitted to it for review and press notice, to the local public library after they have served their purpose in the editorial department. Following the usual custom in the case of donations to the library, the name of the newspaper appears as the donor, on the fly leaf of each publication; so that the newspaper not only contributes to the benefit of the reading public but secures much friendly advertising. The same newspaper also presents each quarter to the library a bound volume of the newspaper for the previous three months, thereby insuring that a complete file will be carefully and safely preserved in the community.—E. R. L.

The Mason City (Ia.) Globe-Gazette has a new idea in weather service. The newspaper obtained the regular government co-operative observer's equipment consisting of a regulation shelter, a mercurial maximum thermometer, an al-

Statement from—

South

Formerly the Hollywood Magazine

SOUTH makes its appearance this month, not as a new Magazine, but as the NEW NAME of an ESTABLISHED PUBLICATION that has been in the field for more than a year. Our December cover bore the name Tropical America, which we cannot now use by reason of a legal conflict with another publishing company that had chosen the same title for a magazine announced to appear in March. Rather than jeopardize the future through long and costly litigation while the right to use the name is being determined, involving huge losses in addition to those already sustained, The Florida Society of America prefers to continue its publication under a new name.

This procedure is purely a concession to expediency, having in mind the welfare and interests of our many thousand readers, and is in no sense a conscious relinquishment of rights legal or moral. It happens that we like SOUTH and we believe the reading public will like it. SOUTH is a good, brief, original and timely name. It carries a certain tinge of audacity to stamp its impress upon the minds of a forgetful public. Capitalizing in the direction trend of the greatest migration in history, SOUTH will command attention through its arresting timeliness, and the provocative challenge of its picturesque appeal.

P. DIRECTORS HEAR ADVISORY REPORT

Central Division Questionnaire Reveals Suggestions of Member Editors—Arguments Heard on Dallas Journal Application for Admission

Results of a questionnaire submitted by gh J. Powell, of the Coffeyville an.) Journal, and chairman of the ad- ory board of the central division, presenting 40 per cent of the total sociated Press membership, was a ture of the quarterly A. P. directors eting held at New York headquarters s week.

Application of the Dallas Evening rnal for membership over the opposi- n of the Dallas Times-Herald was ler discussion when EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press.

Walter Dealey was presenting the case the Journal, and Edwin J. Kiest, plisher, and Tom Gooch, general man- er, voiced objections of the Times- rald.

The questionnaire, sent out to 470 mem- rs in the central division, and answered 167, discusses 19 subjects regarding A. P. service, with recommendations d suggestions for improvement. The plies were accepted by the board to digested and acted upon if advisable.

Expressions of opinion were evenly ided answering one question as to ether or not the membership would ggest fines or other forms of dis- pline for infractions of the A. P. rule bidding member papers from furnish- g news to non-member papers. Of newspaper editors replying to this estion 40 were affirmative and 43 nega- e.

Those who answered the questionnaire re overwhelmingly opposed to any rther reduction in the volume of crime ws carried by the A. P. with the vote in favor and 87 against. Members pplying specific suggestions on this estion, which was number eight of the queries in the questionnaire, objected the manner in which the A. P. handled e Rhinelander case in White Plains, N.

One member wanted "all smut minated" from news stories while other deplored the tendency of crime ws writers to make a hero of a minal.

Another suggestion smothered under as that the A. P. experiment on "a nservative basis" in "producing a news cture service such as we now buy from her concerns and similar to such ser- ces furnished by other telegraph news ganizations." Vote opposing this stood to 38.

In answer to the question "What out- anding news accomplishments of the ssociated Press within the past year erit special mention in the advisory ard's report to the board of directors?", e following were listed:

World Series, Santa Barbara, Cal., rthquake, Collins cave story, P. N.-9 isaster, Missouri tornado, death of William Jennings Bryan, and the elec- on machinery set up by Kent Cooper for porting state political campaign results.

Eighty-three voted for continuance of e A. P.'s plan to run gratis advertise- ents on the association, compared to 32 pposed.

GENEVA MEET APPROVED

THE Associated Press board of directors this week voted to confirm the action of Frank B. Noyes, president, in favoring the proposed Press Conference which may be called under the auspices of the League of Nations at Geneva

At the specific request of Melville E. Stone, secretary, the Board voted to designate Victor F. Lawson, late publisher of the Chicago Daily News as Associated Press founder. A steel engraving of Mr. Lawson is now being prepared and will be sent to each member of the A. P.

The middle western editors showed themselves favorable to the amount of foreign news now being carried on the wires. Asked if too much foreign news was being carried 88 replied no, and 30, yes. It was recommended that dispatches from European countries be made more interpretative.

It was suggested to the directors by members in this district answering the questionnaire that the A. P. add to its service a weekly Washington news letter, a New York letter, and a market letter. One specific request was made that the style of the A. P. writers be "livened up."

A total of 113 as opposed to 6 advised caution to the recommendation that magazine features be supplied at cost "by our cooperative organization."

In addition to Mr. Powell, chairman of other district advisory boards who conferred with the A. P. directorate were Richard Hooker, Springfield Republican, representing the eastern division, and J. N. Heiskell, Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette, southern district. All were unanimous in expressing appreciation in the improvement of the service under the general management of Kent Cooper.

This is the first time that district advisory board chairmen, elected by vote of the state A. P. associations in their various territories, have met with members of the board.

CHICAGO NEWS ELECTS

Strong President, Rogers V. P. and Treasurer, Houghteling Secretary

Election of officers in the newly formed syndicate which has purchased the Chicago Daily News was announced Jan. 22, by Walter A. Strong, publisher and owner of a controlling interest in the newspaper.

The officers are: Mr. Strong, president; Hopewell L. Rogers, vice-president and treasurer; James I. Houghteling, vice-president and secretary. The directors, in addition to the men named, are Charles H. Dennis, George F. Porter, Sewell Avery, Laird Bell, Benjamin V. Becker and Robert P. Lamont.

John J. Mitchell, president of the Illinois Merchants Trust Company, trustee under the will of Victor F. Lawson, late owner of the Daily News, stated that all details of the transfer of ownership had been completed.

TO CONTINUE SPRINGFIELD UNION

But Sunday Edition Will Be Merged with Republican, Hooker States

The Springfield (Mass.) Union, morning and evening, recently purchased by the Springfield Republican, will be continued as a separate publication, under the editorship of Maurice S. Sherman, Richard Hooker, president of the Republican Company, speaking on behalf of Sherman H. Bowles general manager, and himself, told EDITOR & PUBLISHER Jan. 27.

However, the Sunday editions of the Union and Republican will be merged at an early date, he stated.

Stockholders in the Republican Company believe, Mr. Hooker explained, that the community will be best served "by having different points of view honestly, sincerely and ably represented and that, therefore, the Springfield Republican will continue to be produced under the editorship of Waldo L. Cook, the Morning and Evening Union under the editorship of Maurice S. Sherman, and the Springfield Daily News under the editorship of John B. Callaghan, its veteran editor of many years."

LEWISTON, ME., JOURNAL ACQUIRED BY SUN

Paper Founded By Nelson Dingley in 1861 Will Continue Publication —Actual Transfer to Take Place Feb. 1

The Lewiston Evening Journal, its plant, equipment, and all its property, except the real estate and the job printing and engraving departments, have been sold to the owners of the Lewiston Daily Sun, the actual transfer of the property to be made Monday, Feb. 1.

Arthur G. Staples has been retained as editor of the Journal. Hartley L. Lord, who has been business manager of the Journal, retires from the paper and Frank S. Hoy of the Sun will take his place as manager. For a few months at least the Journal will be published in its present quarters. When the Sun building and plant have been made ready, both papers will be issued from the Sun plant at 104 Park Street.

The Journal was established as an evening daily in 1861 by the late Congressman Nelson Dingley who was soon joined by his brother, the late Frank L. Dingley. Together they made the paper one of the most influential in New England. It has been held by the Dingley family for 65 years, until this transfer to the owners of the Sun.

The Sun was established as a morning daily in 1893, and was acquired by its present owners in 1898. Both papers are members of the Associated Press, the Sun having the morning and the Journal the evening membership. This purchase gives the owners of the Sun both the morning and evening papers in Lewiston and Auburn and the control of the field. George W. Wood is president and L. B. Costello is treasurer and general manager.

NEW DAILY IN FLORIDA

Ft. Lauderdale News Launching Morning Sun February 1

The Ft. Lauderdale Morning Sun will make its appearance Feb. 1, carrying full Associated Press leased wire service, Chicago Tribune comics, a daily picture page, full Central Press Service and local news.

It will be entirely separated in operation from the Daily News, although issued from the same plant by the News owners. Mechanical improvement for two papers include purchase of a 32-page Scott press and two more linotypes. John H. Cornett, formerly of Huntington, W. Va., is mechanical superintendent.

The News and Sun are owned by Thomas N. and Horace C. Stillwell, formerly Anderson, Ind., business men.

LYNETT WHO OFFERED COAL PEACE PLAN SAYS PRESS SHOULD LEAD PUBLIC

Editor Who Made Scranton Times a Success, Believes in Crusading Policies—Paper Often Opposes Policies of Town Boosters to Fight for Right

E. J. LYNETT, owner and editor of the Scranton (Pa.) Times, whose strike settlement plan brought about a resumption of the wage parleys between anthracite operators and miners this week at a time when the outlook for further negotiations appeared most gloomy, has pursued the editorial policy that calls for the free and untrammeled presentation of news, without fear or bias.

E. J. Lynett

Mr. Lynett has neither affection nor sympathy for that sort of editorial policy, swiftly vanishing but still found occasionally, which presents its readers not with complete news but with what publishers think the public ought to know.

The Times, a puny thing before the days of Mr. Lynett's ownership, has on repeated occasions under his direction stood virtually alone in several important crusades in the interest of Scranton. Ten, and even five years ago, when the mine cave evil was the city's severest handicap, every civic organization of any account believed that no news of the people's suffering should not get out of Scranton. The Times saw that it did go out, in defiance of the suggestions of the corps of volunteer assistants recruited from the membership of local luncheon clubs. It is now generally admitted that the Times was right in its handling of this matter, just as the superior breadth of its vision is now admitted in several other instances where it found itself at variance with self-appointed community leaders.

"During the present coal controversy", Mr. Lynett said, "the Times has been interested only in the settlement of the strike. It has been wedded to no particular plan for settlement. It doesn't care a hoot at this moment whether its plan or somebody else's is the basis of final settlement, but it is inordinately anxious to see this settlement. Through the life of the conflict to date it has held up the hands of the operators on the issues in which it felt they were right, and those of the miners when it considered the right on their side. Its editorial policy in its treatment of the strike has been consistent in only one respect, that it has favored anything that seemed to promise settlement and a resumption of work at the mines."

Mr. Lynett is no proponent of the theory that newspapers should follow public opinion. For years he has tried quite successfully to lead it in the northern anthracite region, and if he has become noted in his territory for any single thing, it has been his complete disposition to do what appeared to him the best thing for Scranton regardless of what the ever present "civic organizations" thought.

In advancing his strike settlement plan, Editor Lynett did not advance the argument that his proposal was 100 per cent perfect. Instead he pointed out that it was "as loose as ashes." It was advanced simply as a basis for the resumption of wage negotiations, the Times pointed out, at the same time asking the operators and miners to make replies to the terms it had laid down.

Major W. W. Inglis, spokesman for the operators was the first to answer the Lynett proposals. In a letter addressed to Mr. Lynett the operators' chief said he accepted three of the clauses with comment which the Times considered favorable being offered on the rest of the scheme. The result was that the Times looked upon the Inglis letter as having accepted its plan in principle. Mr. Lynett then got in touch with Pres. Lewis of the miners. On the day the proposal was made Mr. Lewis was busy addressing mass meetings of miners. He said he couldn't hope to study the thing for a few days but that he would act with the least possible delay.

A few days later Mr. Lewis arranged to see Mr. Lynett at the Times office. At that time he accepted the Lynett plan as a basis for negotiations and it was thought the way was cleared for a speedy strike settlement. Unfortunately, however, the operators had a surprise. A few hours after the Lewis acceptance was announced the operators took occasion to deny that Mr. Inglis' letter was an acceptance, in fact denied the Lynett plan satisfied them. This was three or four days after the Inglis letter had been published. The Times promptly told the operators they were "welching" and not playing fair with the public. Mr. Lynett also told Mr. Inglis that some other higher power than he in the coal industry had interfered and warned the operators of the rights of the people.

The result of all these developments was climaxed last Saturday when the union leader demanded a resumption of the wage parley at the same time defending the Lynett settlement scheme as having many valuable features.

The strike conference opened in Philadelphia Tuesday, crowning Mr. Lynett's efforts with success, although his settlement plan was rejected by the operators.

The operators objected to his plan because it provided for no method of breaking a deadlock if the conferees failed to agree at the end of two years.

The miners sought to show that Major Inglis had accepted the Lynett plan in principle for two days last week and had issued a denial directly the acceptance of Mr. Lewis was made public.

A motion to accept the Lynett plan was blocked by the operators, and the deadlock, which has resulted in the breaking off of two series of conferences, was reached for the third time.

Mr. Lynett has been owner of the Scranton Times for some 30 years. When he took possession of it the newspaper had a daily circulation of around 1,300. As proof of the way it has grown and prospered under Mr. Lynett's able editorial policy and management it might be said that on the day Pres. Lewis demanded a new wage parley to consider the Lynett strike settlement plan over 52,000 copies of The Times were published. The Times is now having finished a new plant that will cost at least $1,000,000 when completed.

Mr. Lynett has always believed in the policy of close association with his workers. He knows nearly every employe by his first name whether that employe be simply an errand boy or one filling an executive position. Some of his employes are men who have been on his payroll sinc the day he took possession of the Times. They have formed a "Twenty-five Year" club, the only requirement for membership being that the employe had to be in the service of the Times for a quarter of a century.

The Scranton editor who has been engaged in an effort to settle the strike was at one time employed as a slate picker in the industry that is now crippled by the strike. He was born at Dunmore, Pa., which adjoins Scranton, and as a boy worked in the breaker there. Mr. Lynett has for years been recognized as one of the Democratic leaders of Pennsylvania and has on different occasions been honored by the state and national groups of that party. His newspaper has always been Democratic but this has not stopped him from encouraging the election of Republican judges who have made good records on the bench. He believes the bench should be divorced from politics. It was only a few years ago that the Times supported H. M. Edwards, a Republican, for re-election to the bench of Lackawanna county, and Mr. Edwards was elected.

Mr. Lynett has two members of his family enrolled among the scores who get out the Times daily. One of them, his oldest son, William R., is assistant to the publisher. Before assuming this position the younger Lynett served on the Times news staff and also as Washington correspondent. Miss Elizabeth Lynett is a member of the Times' news staff. Edward Lynett, Jr., is attending Holy Cross College at Worcester, Mass.

CIRCULATOR HONORED

Representatives of New York newspapers presented a diamond ring to Abram Newman, manager of the circulation department of the New York Evening Post, at a dinner given in his honor Jan. 23, at the Hotel Pennsylvania, New York.

The New York Telegram, the Newsboys and Newsdealers' Association, the New York Daily News, the Interborough News, and the William Armstrong Publishing Company, presented other gifts to Mr. Newman.

Among those at the speakers' table were Hugh O'Donnell, assistant business manager, New York Times; Andrew Ford, managing editor, New York Telegram, and J. M. Annenberg, circulation director of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the New York Evening Post. James Brady was toastmaster.

The dinner committee consisted of John Dunne, chairman; Thomas W. Canby, secretary; Harry Feldman, treasurer, and Frankie Fay, director of arrangements.

DURKIN SEEKS TO CASH IN

His Relatives Propose to Syndicate His Story But Newspapers Refuse

Chicago newspapers this week told of a plan whereby relatives of Martin Durkin, Chicago gunman indicted for the murder of a government agent and a policeman, were to form a "Durkin news syndicate," selling their material to the newspapers as a means of raising a defense fund.

After the plan had been announced by his relatives, Durkin refused to pose for pictures or to grant interviews to reporters, telling the newspaper men to "see" his relatives. The papers turned down the syndicate and the plan collapsed.

As certain sections of the public had begun to make Durkin a "lion," going so far as to cheer Durkin and hiss the police during the showing of newsreels, the papers are conducting a campaign through cartoons, editorials and interviews with civic and church leaders, to counteract his growing popularity.

Chief of Police Collins, incensed at the demonstrations favorable to Durkin, issued orders that producers withdraw the newsreels featuring the bandit.

WHY HIGH-HAT THE GREAT AMERICAN DOLLAR?

Wage Earners Now in Yesterday's Bank President Class, Agency Man Handling Vantine's Exclusive Store Learns—Save Rent and Add to Advertising Appropriation

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

This is the third article in a series designed to answer: "What is the present advertising trend?"

Emil Maurice Scholtz and Charles M. Peck, who handle the advertising for Vantine's, exclusive New York Oriental store, learned by experience that advertising to the masses attracts real purchasers of the beautiful and the ornate.

E. M. Scholz

"THERE'S money in the pockets of the so-called masses, ready to be spent i shops held sacred to the rich. That is what Emil Maurice Scholz, president of the World Wide Advertising Corporation, New York, learned, following an eye-opening experiment with mass circulation in promoting Christmas shoping in Vantines, one of his personal accounts.

Here was an exclusive Oriental store, catering to igh society with merchandise imrted from the Far East, which l an increased advertising budget, incuding purchase of space in mediums ppealing to the masses, drew surprising owds to its doors.

"Why high-hat the great American ollar?" Mr. Scholz has now concluded.

Last October Vantine's first departed om a former fixed belief that its paonage must be drawn exclusively from e so-called "class element". To capre Christmas trade this specialty shop, ealing in the beautiful and ornate, reined its space in the class newspapers id in addition extended its appropriation place its advertising message in pracally all of New York's newspapers to greater or less extent.

Because of the success of the experient, the new policy will be continued uring 1926. Vantine's advertising udget for the present year is based on pproximately 12 per cent of the gross les, and, according to Mr. Scholz, will e in excess of $150,000.

The same experiment warranted the onclusion that it isn't necessary to be on fain street to be a successful retail merhant, Mr. Scholz declared, pointing out hat being off "the Avenue" was an asset nstead of a liability in that the saving rent could be used efficiently for adertising purposes. Vantine's is located n 39th street, around the corner from ifth avenue.

Mr. Scholz is a director of Vantine's, hich is a closed corporation capitalized t $500,000. He declined to make public efinite figures on the increased business hich followed the wider use of newsapers. He claimed the increase was 100 er cent over last year, when only a few f the available New York daily media ere employed.

On the second Saturday before Christas, the peak of the holiday season, 000 customers entered the store in one ay, a store small indeed compared with he majority of modern department tores. Favorable repercussion has folowed the heavy holiday advertising. ales for January, Mr. Scholz said, will un 35 or 50 per cent ahead of the same nonth last year. Up to and inclusive f Jan. 22, sales had equaled the total or the entire month in 1925.

"Wage earners are wage-spenders and here is a wider distribution of wealth n America today than is generally supposed", Mr. Scholz believes his advertising experiment proved. Working people, looked down upon by self-styled lass stores, are making salaries equal to hat of the bank president of yesterday.

"Class circulation is good, but if a business man is not too proud to ring up on his cash register the money of the masses, he will soon find out that 2,000,000 circulation is more productive of results than several hundred thousand.

"Many people, our own buyers among them, had the idea that Vantine's existed only for customers of large incomes. We have exploded that notion.

"One week-end test of mass circulation was sensational. Advertisements placed on a Friday in media of mass appeal promoting popular-priced objects in the basement, resulted in a vertical upswing in the sales of this department on Saturday, which was reflected throughout the store.

"The same experiment, I believe, would apply to almost any American city. Specialty shops with the 'exclusive complex' will find it worth the expense to buy circulation. Merchants objecting to higher rates for larger circulation are like those who close their eyes to the fact that cloth is purchased by the width as well as by the length.

"If retail merchants are to profit by Vantine's experiment, they must abandon their custom of hugging the class and shunning the mass. The toilers, they will find, have a large purchasing power, and prefer the well kept, carefully conducted store.

"The man or woman who buys a newspaper and can read it is a potential purchaser of merchandise, no matter how 'high-brow' that merchandise is."

Vantine's, a name established in New York when A. A. Vantine, returning from California in gold rush days 76 years ago, opened a small Oriental shop on lower Broadway and commenced consistent newspaper advertising, has, since 1923, been located on 39th street, a little out of the path beaten by New York's surging holiday shoppers, and one reason for the increased advertising energy was to attract gift-seekers from magnetic Fifth avenue. The expending of that energy paid.

"Liberal advertising most certainly will take away the so-called curse of not being on the shoppers' main highway", Mr. Scholz asserted.

"It isn't necessary to be on Main street to be a successful retail merchant today. I would rather be on the main street of newspaper circulation, than be putting my money in a landlord's pocket, thereby sacrificing my advertising appropriation. The $50,000 to $60,000 rental charges Vantine's saved by moving off the avenue has been put to excellent advertising use."

Other interesting points brought out by the experiment in widely distributed advertising were listed as follows by Mr. Scholz:

"Rainy day sales are equal to those in sunshine, if the advertising is kept large and constant.

"The rigid attention on the part of the newspapers to keep their advertising honest, has built up a remarkable and lasting public confidence in the newspaper advertising columns. It requires something more than confidence in a store, when out-of-town people, seeing an advertisement in a New York newspaper, will wire money to purchase the articles advertised. This has happened time and again in the case of Vantine's.

C. M. Peck

"Almost 30 per cent of our business is transacted in December of each year. July and August have hitherto been low-water marks. We expect our increased budget, however, will make possible more advertising in these months.

The Vantine copy is under the direction of Charles M. Peck, of the World Wide Advertising Corporation. His method of conducting the advertising department of Vantine's is fashioned after that of a daily newspaper's news room. The buyers of the various departments act as reporters, bringing in details of the articles to be advertised each day. Mr. Peck acts as combination managing editor and make-up man.

"We believe a highly illustrated advertisement is more productive than the mere plain statement of the article to be sold", Mr. Scholz continued. "Institutional copy for a store, while very pleasing to the owners of the business, is, we believe, frequently waste space, and we do not use it. The direct sales method of touching only on the merchandise itself is, in our opinion, the most desirable.

"It is our aim in the advertisement to present as nearly as possible a complete range of the store. We do not pick the articles we promote in our copy because of their bargain appeal. In some advertisements we have been able to mention and illustrate as many as 80 different articles, affording readers an opportunity to shop in the advertising columns."

A. A. Vantine, the founder of the store, was in California when that State was nearer to China and Japan than it was to New York, and he conceived the idea of making connections with Oriental merchants in order to return to New York and open a store to sell the teak woods, bronzes and perfumes he could thus obtain. Accomplishing his purpose, the store was opened first on lower Broadway, and subsequently moved to 18th street and then to 39th street and Fifth avenue. In 1923 the ownership was offered an excellent profit for sale of the Fifth avenue site and accepted. for a hiatus of about a year, the name of Vantine's was lost to the public. Then a specially constructed store was opened at the present location.

Prior to October of this year Vantine's, according to Mr. Scholz, had a 50,000-line contract in the New York Times; the same amount in the New York Herald Tribune; and a 35,000-line contract in the New York Sun.

The store's linage since the first of November, Mr. Scholz said, has been distributed as follows: 50,000 lines, New York Times: 40,000 lines, New York World and Evening World; 40,000 lines, New York Sun; 20,000 lines, New York Herald Tribune; 10,000 lines New York Evening Journal; 10,000 lines, New York Daily News; 10,000 lines, New York Evening Graphic; 10,000 lines, New York Telegram; and 2,500 lines, New York Mirror.

PARKHURST, COLORADO EDITOR, WINS FIGHT AGAINST RAILROADS

ARTHUR A. PARKHURST, editor of the Boulder (Col.) News-Herald through his vigorous and militant editorials forced the railroads to restore Boulder and the nearby towns of Longmont, Loveland, Ft. Collins, Brighton, Greeley, Eaton and Windsor as common passenger points. The victory of his battle against the railroads which he began in October, 1922, came in the decision handed down by the United States Interstate Commerce Commission, stating that Boulder, and the towns listed above should have the same summer tourist rates as Denver, Pueblo and Colorado Springs.

Before the government took over the railroads during the war, Boulder and the other cities enjoyed the common passenger point rates, that is about a fare and a tenth round trip to these points from St. Louis, Chicago, Kansas City and Omaha. But when the private companies took back the roads they eliminated these cities from the common passenger point list. It not only meant that it would cost more to get to Boulder but that Boulder and the other towns were deprived of the advertising that the roads give the places included in their summer tourist points.

Realizing that this seriously hampered tourist travel to that university city, upon which much of its summer trade depends, the editor took up the issue. Through the columns of his daily paper he aroused public sentiment and obtained the backing of the Chamber of Commerce.

When the case went before the Interstate Commerce Commission last summer Parkhurst went to Washington himself to present the facts to the commission. Now Boulder will be able to develop unhampered her plan to become a summer resort, as the new rate will become effective in March.

Parkhurst came to Boulder ten years ago to take the editorship of the Boulder News-Herald.

Today he can look back on a long series of public benefits that he has wrought through his editorials and news columns. From the first he assumed a militant editorial policy.

One of the first battles he waged was in 1918 when the city gas company was changing from natural to artificial gas. Consumer's bills increased about 200 per cent. Feeling that this increase was unjustified the editor wrote some forceful editorials. In less than three days the gas company refunded $2,000 to its customers.

HUMPHREY LEAVES SICK BED TO ATTACK TRADE BODY'S NEWSPAPER RULING

"Unanimous" Decision Upset By His Dissent to Ruling Linking Newspapers with Agencies in Complaint Involving 15 Per Cent Commission

By J. BART. CAMPBELL

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25.—A dramatic return from a sick bed by Commissioner William E. Humphrey tossed unexpectedly the traditional monkey-wrench into the apparently unanimous decision of the Federal Trade Commission in the newspaper advertising case.

Commissioner Humphrey, in at once dissenting from the decision, expressed himself as "astounded" that three fellow members of the Commission should have reached such a far-reaching conclusion not only in his unavoidable absence but in that of Commissioner Huston Thompson.

The three members of the Commission who arrived at the decision, which overruled the motion of counsel for newspaper and advertising organizations to dismiss the Commission's original complaint alleging that they combine to control national advertising upon the basis of a standard trade differential of 15 per cent, are John F. Nugent, the present chairman of the Commission; Charles W. Hunt and Vernon W. Van Fleet.

When EDITOR & PUBLISHER first learned officially of the decision, it was represented as a "unanimous" action by the Commission. That was soon after Commissioners Nugent, Hunt and Van Fleet agreed to overrule the motion for dismissal on Wednesday.

Coincident with the publication exclusively in EDITOR & PUBLISHER of the majority decision, Commissioner Humphrey returned to his office and made it known that he is not in accord with his three associates.

Since he was operated upon at a Washington hospital early in December, Commissioner Humphrey has been unable to attend to his official duties regularly.

But his return from a sick bed did not deter him from dictating a repudiation of the decision reached by his three fellow members, and to reveal that the Commission, instead of being "unanimous" regarding the extent of its jurisdiction over advertising, is split seriously upon the subject.

Commissioner Humphrey's ultimatum is this:

"There is not, in my judgment, a single fact, either in the record or in the argument of counsel, to justify making the various newspapers parties to this action. If the facts show anything on this point, it is that the newspapers are the victims and not the participants in this controversy."

He also declared that the 15 per cent commission referred to is "not unfair to anyone."

EDITOR & PUBLISHER learned that the action of Commissioner Humphrey's three fellow members was based largely upon the recommendations of William T. Kelley, assistant chief counsel for the Commission, who is credited with the preparation of the amended complaint issued by Commissioners Nugent, Hunt and Van Fleet at the same time they made their majority ruling.

Following his return here from an extended trip through the west, Commissioner Thompson informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER that while he was not present Wednesday when Commissioners Nugent, Hunt and Van Fleet reached their decision, that he did not care to comment upon it.

Commissioner Thompson also refused to state whether he would have voted with his three fellow commissioners had he been present.

It was, however, pointed out to EDITOR & PUBLISHER that the decision reached by Commissioners Nugent, Hunt and Van Fleet does not end the case by any means.

A regional examiner will be designated by the Commission soon, it was explained, to take testimony in the case in various cities. The taking of this testimony will probably require weeks. In the meanwhile the respondents, who under the amended majority complaint now include the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and the Six Point League, will be given ample opportunity to make replies.

Several months may elapse before the taking of testimony is completed and the complete testimony returned to the Commission. How soon a final decision may be reached in the case is therefore dependent upon how much time may be consumed by both sides in the presentation of testimony before the examiner wherever he may sit.

An itinerary for the examiner is now being prepared and will soon be announced by the Commission.

The text of Commissioner Humphrey's statement, which embodied his dissenting opinion, as furnished to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, follows:

"Being prevented by illness from being present when the motion of the respondents to dismiss this action for want of jurisdiction was decided, I want to place on record my dissent to the action of the Commission in their overruling such motion.

"In order to invoke the jurisdiction of the Commission, it must be alleged and proven that the respondents have been or are using an unfair method of competition in interstate commerce, which has a dangerous tendency to unduly hinder competition or create monopoly. The facts in this case, appearing from the record and from the argument of counsel, fail at every vital point.

"The agreements and practices alleged against which the Commission is asked to make an order to cease and desist:

"1. Do not constitute a method of competition in commerce; they relate entirely to the sale of advertising space in newspapers, and advertising is not commerce; it is service;

"2. Do not constitute a method of competition. Newspapers pay uniform commissions on their advertising rates, which rates are not uniform but fixed by each newspaper for its own purposes and on its own independent judgment. Newspapers may be competitors with each other, but they are not competitors with advertising agencies or advertisers. The Commission has no power over the commissions that the newspapers may pay to their agencies.

"Advertising agencies may compete with each other, but the uniform commission paid by newspapers for their service is not a method of competition as among them.

"The uniform commission referred to is not unfair to anyone. The agreements and practices complained of do not hinder competition in commerce or tend to create a monopoly therein. Not one fact in the case indicates such a tendency.

"It may be that certain advertising agencies desire to maintain a system of rebates to advertisers of portions of the commission paid to them by the newspapers. Admitted that such practices would be unfair, it is not a method of competition in commerce, and the federal trade commission would have no power to prevent such practices.

"There is not, in my judgment, a single fact, either in the record or in the argument of counsel, to justify making the various newspapers parties to this action. If the facts show anything on this point, it is that the newspapers are the victims and not the participants in this controversy.

"This whole case may be summed up in this statement: that it is the effort of a very few large advertisers to coerce the newspapers to give them a rebate equal to the commission that the newspaper pays to its advertising agencies. In other words, it is an effort on the part of certain large advertisers to compel the newspapers to grant them special privileges. Certainly the newspapers may fairly refuse to make such unfair discrimination in favor of a few powerful advertisers.

"The practices and methods followed by the newspapers in this controversy, are exactly analogous to the methods and practices of the insurance business of the country and all other businesses conducted on a commission basis.—W. E. Humphrey, Commissioner."

SIXTH DISTRICT CLUBS MEET IN CHICAGO

Community Advertising Totalled $5,000,000 Last Year Mowry Reports — Woodbridge and Pierce Speak—Younggreen Renamed V. P.

Community advertising—the promotion of cities, districts, states and sections through the purchase of space in newspapers and magazines—has an application in all fields of advertising, Don Mowry, general secretary of the Madison (Wis.) Chamber of Commerce, said in an address before the Sixth District convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, meeting here at the Hotel LaSalle, Chicago, Jan. 21-22.

During 1925 $5,000,000 was spent in this field, according to Mr. Mowry, of which $750,000 was spent by states and other units of government. Resulting developments are the subject of a questionnaire sent out by Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover.

"The promotion work of hotels in the larger cities, definitely linked up with communities, has assumed such proportions," Mr. Mowry said, "that a department for hotel publicity and advertising men is to be created in the American Community Advertising Association at their meeting in Toledo the end of the month."

Mr. Mowry recommended that provision be made by the Associated Advertising Clubs so that a monthly bulletin could be published, giving the latest developments in the community advertising field.

C. King Woodbridge, president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, pronounced organized advertising to be "the most constructive piece of work in speeding up the distribution of commodities and ideas from producer to consumer." This is represented by the work being accomplished by his clubs he said.

The National Better Business Bureau was characterized as "the savior of advertising," by Frank L. Pierce of Detroit who explained its work.

"We have found by practical experience," Mr. Pierce said, "that the cheat is always looking for some kind of an excuse for carrying on his false advertising and selling methods, so if he can find some dealer who stands well in the business world using loose advertising he is happy. He has found his alibi and points with confidence at the similarity of their transgressions, or we may find honest dealers using deceptive advertising that sprung from so-called trade practices such as deceptive trade names or the misuse of comparative prices, which antagonize their competitors, causing retaliatory methods.

C. C. Younggreen of Klau-Van Pietersom-Dunlap-Younggreen Advertising Agency, Milwaukee, was re-elected a vice-president for the district.

Louisville was chosen for the next meeting place.

S. N. P. A. BOARD TO MEET

Federal Trade Complaint Slated for Discussion in Chattanooga

A meeting of the officers and the board of directors of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association has been called by President W. C. Johnson to meet in Chattanooga Feb. 7 and 8.

At the approaching session several matters of importance to southern daily newspapers will be considered, including the prosecution of the newspapers by the Federal Trade Commission, changes in freight rates on newsprint paper, second class postal rates, plans and program for the next convention, the joint newspaper advertising campaign of the south, and cost finding methods and accounting.

Officers of the association are: W. C. Johnson, president; Cranston Williams, manager; Wiley L. Morgan, secretary-treasurer.

Advertising Co-Operation Sells Goods in Detroit!

Reproduction of Full Color Panel Placed In Store Windows

WINDOW displays of nationally advertised goods placed and arranged by The Detroit News in dealers' windows have double significance and attention-getting value because of the unique poster panel that forms a part of the display. This poster, illustrated above, has as its central figure, the famous Mr. Straphanger—now a nationally popular character—originated by Burt Thomas, staff cartoonist of The Detroit News. Mr. Straphanger is known to every man, woman and child of Detroit and vicinity. Mr. Straphanger represents the average man in every cartoon drawn by Burt Thomas for the editorial page of The News and is also the hero of a Sunday Comic Page in full color, which is not only being published in Detroit but also in Boston, Brooklyn, Milwaukee and other cities.

The attention-getting value of Mr. Straphanger was remarkably illustrated when thousands of letters, telegrams and even telephone calls responded to a request for prize winning solutions to the question, "What happened to Elmer, Straphanger's lost dog?" Had Straphanger been a flesh and blood citizen of Detroit of widest popular acclaim the interest in his lost dog could not have been greater or more real.

NATIONAL AD COMMISSION ENDORSES $500,000 A. A. C. W. REFINANCING PLAN

Toledo Meeting Approves New Budget and Expansions—C. King Woodbridge Tells of International Scope of Ad Club Work—Fifth District Meets

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 27—Indorsement by the National Advertising Commission of the $500,000 refinancing campaign of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World was the high spot in the Commission meeting at Hotel Secor here Tuesday and Wednesday.

An "On to Toledo in 1928" campaign was launched Wednesday noon at the joint meeting of the National Commission and the Fifth District meeting by Thomas H. Sewell, president of the Toledo Advertising Club.

The National Commission was welcomed by Mayor Mery, President Sewell and Miss Julia Colburn, advertising manager of La Salle & Kochs Department Store and president of the Toledo Woman's Advertising Club. After the opening session the commission went to the Willys-Overland factory for lunch which was followed by inspection of the plant.

At the Overland plant luncheon, Leroy Pede, sales manager, Willys-Overland, told the National Commission that the pulling power of a certain national weekly of immense circulation has fallen far below that it used to be.

C. King Woodbridge, president of the A. A. C. W. and head of the Dictaphone Corporation, New York, Tuesday afternoon urged the desirability of making the association truly international in scope. "In London the international convention made us cognizant that we were international in fact," he said. "Advertising clubs are being formed in South America, the British Advertising Association has just been organized to include all British ad clubs and Australia even sent a delegate to the Houston convention. Obviously the next step is to make the organization truly international.

"It might be wise to change the name of the Associated Advertising Clubs of World to the Associated Advertising Interests of the World to stress that the Association is more than an aggregation of clubs."

The National Commission also had before it Tuesday afternoon a discussion of coordination of the National Commission and the National Better Business Bureaus and allied organizations into one smooth-running group to avoid duplication of functions. Earle Pearson, general manager of the Associated Clubs, detailed progress of the plans for the Philadelphia convention, warning individual clubs to see that reservation for hotel accommodations are made at once.

The Commission attended a dinner in the Hotel Secor Tuesday night as guests of Toledo newspapers. President Woodbridge, Chairman W. Frank McClure of the Commission, and Toledo newspaper men spoke. Grove Patterson of the Toledo Blade was toastmaster.

Other speakers at the Tuesday night meeting included Frank Heller, editor Toledo News-Bee and Richard Patterson, president, Toledo Times Publishing Co.

Grove Patterson asserted that the eighth wonder of the world is the low price of newspaper advertising space. Don Bridge, merchandising and national advertising manager of the Indianapolis News seconded the assertion and said that advertising is largely responsible for newspaper circulation among the great mass of people.

George M. Burbach, director of advertising, St. Louis Post-Dispatch and representative of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives brought to attention again the statement of Mr. Pede regarding the failing strength of magazine advertising.

"I feel that the newspapers are largely responsible for the growth of the automobile industry," he said. "I am sorry to say that part of that growth came through space grafting in the newspapers while magazines got paid space."

C. King Woodbridge paid a tribute to newspaper advertising at the Tuesday night dinner saying: "I think the newspapers of this country are second to no other factor in contributing to the success of advertising."

The Fifth District clubs and the National Commission held a joint session Wednesday noon in the Chamber of Commerce, C. Frank McClure presiding. To give Toledo business men an opportunity to hear speakers at the joint meeting the Toledo ad clubs carried on a special membership campaign and enrolled 75 new members, including executives of several prominent business houses.

The commission merged sessions Wednesday with the Fifth District A. A. C. W. delegates at the general session Wednesday morning. Gordon K. Kingsbury, secretary of the Adcraft Club of Detroit presided and there were to be talks by Mrs. Edith McClure Patterson, of Dayton, home budget chairman of the general federation of woman clubs and by Don Bridge, of the Indianapolis News. Departmental round tables were held Wednesday afternoon.

Alfred B. Koch of the La Salle & Koch Company, Toledo, was toastmaster at the annual banquet and dance Wednesday evening.

Gilbert W. Montague, New York lawyer, spoke on the new attitude of government toward business. George W. Stevens, director of the Toledo Museum of Art also was a speaker.

The Thursday morning program was in charge of Prof. H. H. Maynard, Ohio State University, president, Advertising Club of Columbus.

The session closed with "The Anvil Chorus," a session for advertising critics. Karl Aschbacher, Swan Creek Lumber Company, Toledo, presided.

A.A.C.W. CAMPAIGN

Committee Members Named to Head Expansion Program

Francis H. Sisson, vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company, New York, and chairman of the general campaign committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, has appointed the following members to his committee:

William Wrigley Jr., William Wrigley Jr. Company, Chicago; Frank W. Harwood, American Tobacco Company, New York; Don E. Gilman, Christian Science Monitor; William G. Rook, Canadian H. W. Gossard Company, Ltd., Montreal; Amon G. Carter, Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram; and Kerwin H. Fulton, General Outdoor Advertising Company, New York.

The A. A. C. W. campaign launched the first of this year seeks to raise $500,000 with which to expand various association departments.

Speaking at the Advertising Club of New York, Jan. 20, C. King Woodbridge, association president, spoke on the A. A. C. W. ideals and asked support of the drive.

Bomber Threatened Tabloid Plant

Vincenzo Capuiano, who said he had been editor of an archistic paper in Italy arrested by New York police this week told them he had intended to blow up the offices of the Corriere d'America, New York Italian tabloid, because this newspaper supported the fascist regime. Two bombs, either of them sufficiently powerful to blow up a 12-story building were found on him. He was charged with violating the Sullivan law, and held in default of $50,000 bail for further hearing. He had deferred setting off the bombs, he said, because the street in front of the newspapr plant was filled with children.

OHIO DAILY CHANGES HANDS

Raridan and Associates Buy Lima Republican Gazette

John D. Raridan with associates has purchased the majority interest in the Lima (O.) Republican-Gazette, and has assumed charge as president and general manager. For the last six years, he has been connected with King Feature Syndicate and International News Service as middle western business representative.

The majority stock into which Mr. Raridan and his associates come into possession has been owned by L. S. Galvin, of Lima. The minority interest, held by the Samuel A. Baxter Sons Company, is retained in the company and the cooperation of C. S. Baxter as vice-president, is continued.

Among Mr. Raridan's associates is Raymond E. Van Camp, of the Van Camp Construction Company, Columbus, O., who will be a director.

J. A. Abey, former circulation manager, Ft. Worth Record, has joined the organization as business manager.

INDIANA EDITORS MEETING

Syndicate Features, Lotteries and Radio Topics at Convention

Radio and the newspapers, syndicate features, and lottery schemes are subjects scheduled for discussion at the annual convention of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association, meeting at the Columbia Club, Indianapolis, Jan. 28-29. La Porte (Ind.) Dailies Merged

The LaPorte (Ind.) Times, established Oct. 7, 1924, has been purchased and discontinued by the LaPorte Herald-Argus. Both were evening papers, the purchase leaving the Herald-Argus in control of the field. The Herald-Argus is owned and operated by H. A. Lindgren, president and general manager and Charles A. Beal, business manager. The Times was launched with Harold Van Trump as editor. The merger was handled by Palmer, De Witt & Palmer, Newspaper brokers, New York.

Padlocks for Boasting Cops

Policemen of Jersey City, N. J., were this week ordered to be modest in narrating their exploits to newspaper men. The order warns against "ornamentation" of stories given to reporters by individual policemen involved. Disciplinary action will follow violation.

RECORD BREAKING YEAR IN NEWSPRINT MAKING

Production of 3,162,000 Tons in North America During 1925 Eclipses All Former Totals—Represents 9 Per Cent Gain

All previous newsprint production records were broken last year with a total North American output of 3,162,000 tons or 9 per cent more than in 1924, and a North American consumption equivalent to 98 per cent of the production, R. S. Kellogg, secretary reported at the annual meeting of the News Print Service Bureau in Montreal, Jan. 29.

For several years Canada has been aspiring to displace the United States as the world's premier newsprint paper producer, and the race in 1925 was neck and neck, with Canada a few tons ahead during each of seven months and only 8,000 tons behind on the year's total, Mr. Kellogg said. The final figures show 1,530,000 tons made in the United States, 1,522,000 tons in Canada, 97,000 tons in Newfoundland and 13,000 tons in Mexico making a Continental total of 60 per cent of the world total of some 5,000,000 tons of newsprint.

The United States output was 3 per cent more than in 1924 and 1 per cent greater than in the previous record year of 1920, while Canada made 12 per cent more than in 1924 and 74 per cent more than in 1920. In the face of all this, stocks of paper in the hands of both manufacturers and newspaper publishers were lower at the end of the year than for a long time past, due to the unprecedentedly heavy consumption during the last quarter of 1925.

There has been no change in Mexican newsprint production for several years, but an increase of 52 per cent over 1924 in Newfoundland was the beginning of an enlarged production in that colony which will be still more marked in 1926.

Newsprint consumption in the United States in 1925, amounting to nearly 3,000,000 tons, if spread out in a single sheet would cover 20,000 square miles, or the combined areas of Massachusetts, Connecticut and New Jersey. To furnish this amount for the newsprint users in the United States took all but 23,000 tons of the domestic production, 85 per cent of the Canadian output, 133,000 tons from overseas and 20,000 tons from Newfoundland. Imports of overseas newsprint into the United States, which began with 50,000 tons in 1920 and reached a maximum of 200,000 tons in 1923, dropped to 156,000 tons in 1924 and 23,000 tons lower in 1925. On the other hand, 1925 marks the definite entry of Newfoundland newsprint into the United States market, with a much greater amount to come in 1926. Altogether, only 51 per cent of the newsprint used in the United States in 1925 was of domestic production.

"A consumption of 52 pounds per capita last year, compared with only 25 pounds as recently as 1910 and 42 pounds in 1920 indicates smething of the inveterate appetites of the printing presses in the United States," Mr. Kellogg said. "It must not be assumed, however, that such a rate of increase in consumption will be indefinitely maintained.

"The present tremendous use of newsprint is the direct result of increased newspaper sizes and circulations, stimulated by newspaper advertising.

"Newspaper advertising in the leading cities of the United States totaled 5 per cent more in 1925 than in the previous year and 6 per cent more than in 1920, which was an advertising year not soon to be forgotten. On the other hand, the volume of periodical advertising, while 3 per cent more in 1925 than in 1924. was still 16 per cent less than the 1920 record.

"From 1919 to 1925 inclusive, additions to the North American newsprint manufacturing industry have totaled 50 machines of 3,500 tons daily capacity, of which 11 machines were in the United States, 35 in Canada and 4 in Newfoundland. Other new machines under construction which will be installed during the first half of 1926 will make a total manufacturing capacity of 6,300 tons daily in Canada and 5,500 tons in the United States, in addition to which there will be by that time a daily capacity of 700 tons in Newfoundland. During the past six years actual production of the newsprint mills has averaged about 90 per cent of rated capacity. On this basis, a Continental output of 3,500,000 tons will soon be possible."

FREE PAPERS N. Y. TOPIC

They Offer Little Competition Northern Group Decides—Corse Re-elected

Free distribution newspapers cannot seriously compete with an established daily or weekly newspaper it was decided by members of the Northern New York Press Association, following thorough discussion of the subject at their 13th annual meeting in Watertown, Jan. 23.

A. Oberlander of Syracuse, who spoke on the free newspaper, said he did not believe that a small town publisher could possibly made a free distribution paper with a circulation of 5,000 pay a profit, He pointed out that the cost of mailing papers, which is one and a half cents to farmers on rural free delivery routes, was in itself prohibitive.

Evidence was submitted showing that in 12 or 15 towns where free papers had been established, only two of them have been successful.

At the business session Saturday morning a resolution favoring the Kendall bill to restrain the government from printing return cards on envelopes was passed. State legislation which would remove billboards from highways was favored. It was agreed by all members present that publishers should not accept advertising orders from concerns sending copy without asking for rates.

It was suggested that each publisher circulate a petition in his town asking that the village treasurer's reports be published.

F. D. Corse, publisher of the Sandy Creek (N. Y.) News was unanimously re-elected president. Other officers elected were: F. J. Rich, Carthage Republican-Tribune, secretary and treasurer, L. C. Sutton, Massena Observer, first vice-president, C. H. Congdon, Watertown Times, second vice-president. G. A. Willard, Boonville Herald, third vice-president.

Editor Cited for Contempt

Harold Stanley Pollard, editor New York Evening World, was this week summoned to appear before Justice A. J. Levy in Supreme Court Friday, Jan. 29, to show cause why he should not be punished for criminal contempt of court. Action is based on editorials regarding bail printed in the World.

NEYLAN HEADS HEARST COAST INTERESTS

Named Chief Counsel of Hearst Publications, Inc., and Member Executive Council—Young and Carrington Promoted

John Francis Neylan, vice-president of Hearst Publications, Inc., was renamed to that post and in addition appointed chief counsel of Hearst Publications, Inc., and it subsidiaries, with general supervision of the Hearst Pacific coast interests, in an announcement made in San Francisco, Jan. 21.

Charles S. Young was promoted to publisher of the San Francisco Call and Richard A. Carrington to publisher of the Oakland Post-Enquirer in the announcement, which read as follows:

"Because of the increasing importance of the western properties of Hearst Publications, Incorporated, and of the personal interests of Mr. William Randolph Hearst, in the western part of the United States generally, the following steps have been taken: John Francis Neylan retains the vice-presidency of Hearst Publications, Inc., and in addition, as of Jan. 1, 1926, becomes chief counsel of Hearst Publications, Inc., and its subsidiaries, with general supervision of Mr. Hearst's interests on the Pacific Coast. Neylan has also been elected a member of the Executive Council of all Hearst interests in America. He will retain the presidency of the Call Publishing Company and the chairmanship of its board of directors and will be relieved of the detail responsibility as publisher of the San Francisco Call.'

"Charles S. Young, for three years past publisher of the Oakland Post-Enquirer is promoted to the position of publisher of the San Francisco Call.

"Richard A. Carrington, for three years past advertising manager of the Oakland Post-Enquirer, is promoted to the position of publisher of the Oakland Post-Enquirer."

SENATOR CRITICIZES A. P.

Simmons of North Carolina Says Minority Views on Tax Bill Slighted

U. S. Senator Furnifold M. Simmons of North Carolina, ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee last week charged the Associated Press with "playing down" a statement embodying the views of the Democratic minority on the proposed tax reduction, in an interview given to Jonathan Daniels, son of former Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels, Washington correspondent for his father's newspaper, the Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer; H. E. C. Bryant, Washington correspondent for the Charlotte Observer, Asheville Citizen and other North Carolina newspapers; and R. E. Powell, Washington correspondent for the Durham Morning Herald, the Raleigh Evening Times, and other newspapers of the same state. The story was printed in the South.

The gist of Senator Simmons' complaint was that the A. P. carried in almost full text the statement of Senator Reed Smoot of Utah, Republican chairman of the Finance Committee, while the statement made by himself as spokesman for the Democratic minority was "garbled, twisted and disarranged" preventing newspaper readers from getting both sides of the situation.

Investigation by the A. P. showed that copies of Senator Simmons' statement had, according to custom been left at the National Press Club for newspaper men, and that the A. P. did not directly receive a copy.

In a letter to L. C. Probert, head of the Washington A. P. bureau, Senator Simmons reiterated the statements made in the interview and after a full discussion of the case said:

"Notwithstanding the import of this new information, I submit that the circumstances of this situation should have suggested to the Associated Press representative, the propriety of obtaining upon his own initiative, some statement from the minority upon a matter of such importance as a compromise of conflicting views between the minority and the majority upon a matter of such acute interest to the taxpayers and people of the country."

At A. P. New York headquarters it was stated that thorough investigation of the charges was underway, and that no reply, statement, or comment would be made until such investigation was completed. It was indicated a reply would be ready for publication in Editor & Publisher next week.

New Jersey Press to Meet

LYNETT—PEACEMAKER

ALL honor to E. J. Lynett, veteran publisher of the Scranton (Pa.) Times for a valiant, if unsuccessful effort, to bring the disastrous coal strike to an end. The way of the peace-maker is proverbially hard, but this well-established fact did not deter this editor from attempting to lead the warring elements out of the morass of bickering, while 158,000 strikers and their families continued idle, while vast numbers of men and women were indirectly injured, while every day meant an economic loss of 266,000 tons of needed coal, and great cities were being marred by sooted atmosphere.

Mr. Lynett nobly served a public cause, true to the best traditions of the American press, and his act stands out in bold relief in the journalism of the day.

To determine your newspaper's accuracy in prophesy and news statement read the 1925 file in the light of present knowledge.

INTELLIGENT EDITORSHIP

A VALUED acquaintance is the executive editor of a New York morning newspaper, whose modesty forbids identification here, for we are to tell of a truly great newspaper man.

He works a ten-hour day, running through the evening hours. It is doubtful if there are a dozen men in journalism who encounter a greater number of editorial experiences and routine operations in a week than does our friend. He is a calm man, working head, not feet, foremost. He may not always be right, but he is always decisive. There is no doubt in the minds of those associated with him where he stands on questions of policy. He says exactly what he means. He is a capable judge of news values and an indefatigble searcher for truth.

But this man knows more than one thing—more than his direct job. His crowded days are not too full to prohibit study. If you were to ask him what the milline advertising rate of his newspaper is, or how it compares with rates of rivals, he could tell you. He is a keen student of advertising science, reads advertising, studies merchandising methods, and could make an instructive impromptu talk to a group of merchants or copy writers, though he never does so.

Our friend seeks to know all that there is to be known concerning the circulation methods of the metropolis. He is a student of distribution statistics.

Because he is at home in the composing room, knowing what he is talking about, he is the newspaper's chief spokesman among the printers, his word respected. This editor knows what efficient type-setting is and what are fair costs.

This editor often tells us that he reads EDITOR & PUBLISHER every week, from cover to cover, taking it to his home and filing it there for future reference. It is with a sense of personal pleasure that we are giving to this man the topical annual index, to be found in the 1926 Year Book, as an aid to his use of this journal. He will use it and he will sift through, with a comprehending eye, the 300 pages of the Year Book and extract a thousand facts upon which to base sound calculations in his job.

Our friend should be an inspiration to young men just entering the broad field of journalism and advertising. As he has come up from the ranks, a poor country lad landing in one of the highest editorial positions of New York, they also may ascend if they possess the information and ability to apply it that our friend has gathered and uses as a part of his job. Young advertising man, school yourself in the art of writing, editing and printing, if you would run your course on both legs, not one! Young editorial man, penetrate every phase of this business, be an all-around student of your work, if you aspire to high position! Dig into the wealth of fact that is held between the covers of EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S 1926 YEAR BOOK, it will hold you spellbound if you are really serious in your aspirations. Follow week by week the current of trade and professional journalism in the columns of this paper. Fill your niche, do your local job, but build for the future a fund of technical information which will prepare you for ever ascending service. Men achieve in exact proportion to knowledge.

Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?—Isaiah, XI; 12.

SWAY OF THE MOB

DOES "the mob" sway the press? William Hard talked interestingly on this topic at the recent convention of editors at Washington. His remarks were in reference to political reporting and interpretation.

There are all sorts of newspapers and surely there is no absolute standard of editorship. Almost anything can be said of "the press" and be both true and false. To deal fairly and accurately with newspaper practise one must speak in specific terms.

Editors there are who rise and fall at the command of "the mob," servile in their catering as waiters at a noonday club. Editors there are who, when the public is hysterical and all the seeming advantages lie on the side of "the mob," stand their ground for principle and "tell 'em" what they need to know. The great god Circulation is not possessed of absolute power, but great is he and black his crimes.

Here is an exception which proves again that no one may safely generalize about the press. Out in Chicago a young sheik had been terrorizing the police in a campaign of crime, running to murder. Flashy, daring, a "lady's man," he made a "hit" with the hysterical mob. Run to earth, he became a subject for the news-reel and when the police discovered that "the mob" was cheering this criminal as a hero at every performance, while hissing the officers of the law as they appeared on the screen, the mayor of Chicago ordered suppression of the film.

At the same time a proposal was made by members of the criminal's family to syndicate to the press his "own story." No experienced newspaper man would deny that it would have been a circulation success. The same commercial motive of the movie industry was present for the press.

But the mayor of Chicago was not compelled to intervene to stop the newspapers from glorifyi this red-handed terrorist. The syndicate proposal w promptly refused by newspaper editors.

It is a small incident, but more typical of editori temper than most people believe. Constantly, every newspaper office, conscientious men are strivi to conserve principle and sift the wheat from t chaff. It was well for the public to know of Durki Obviously, it was wrong to flatter his criminal co ceit or pander to a thoughtless mob's idea of "her worship.

Advertising men who do not understand the merchandising problems of their clients are like doctors prescribing for patients with total disregard of symptoms.

LETTERS FROM READERS

A PUBLISHER asks EDITOR & PUBLISHER to sug gest "some means of inducing our readers write brief letters to the editor which we ca print on the editorial page, as we consider this goo stuff, and many times there are ticklish local prob lems which the editor might hesitate to write abou but which a reader might bring out for general dis cussion."

Inasmuch as it has long been known that the publi forum is one of the best read features of a newspape it is remarkable that more editors do not encourag it. The way to make a forum in a newspaper success is to give contributors a full, free chance t be heard. A good way to kill the interest of both readers and contributors is to select only those letter which agree with your editorial policies and pa the paper on the back. Within sensible space limits and if the ordinary rules of decency and fair-play are conserved, the writers of letters to the edito should be permitted to have their fling, even if they are, by the editor, considered extreme, mistaken o ill-advised. Get one good letter, provoking though and discussion, and dozens more will flow.

Maybe there are some "ticklish local problems' that newspaper editors should dodge, but we can' imagine them or approve of such editorship. There is a way to meet every issue fairly and squarely in newspaper editing. Most of the fears of weak editors which inhibit free expression, are mere menta shadows. Speak out, Mr. Editor—have your say and if you are sincere you may even be dead wrong without dire consequences. When you begin to write from your heart and soul, without fear or favor, in behalf of what you conceive to be the welfare o your people and your town, country and world, the problem will be to find space for the letters that your good stuff will provoke among readers. Strong editorial pages invariably provoke good letters; it is one of the sure tests of editorial page efficiency.

Large city newspapers, averages show, are losing country circulation, thereby verifying the prediction that the Government's postal policy is calculated to limit newspaper reading—is that a good public policy?

SUGARING?

SPEAKING before the American Society of Newspaper Editors at Washington, W. O. Jones, Lincoln (Neb.) State Journal, said that the "brother of a rather famous sporting man" had told him that his brother had spent, in one year $24,000 in "sugaring" sports writers.

There was brief discussion of this matter, but it did not receive anywhere near the consideration it has long deserved.

It is the belief of EDITOR & PUBLISHER that the subject of "sugaring" should be vigorously investigated by a committee for the Society, both in the field of sports and in financial reporting. This is not to be taken as an inference that all sport or financial reporters accept bribes for favorable publicity, for many of them we know are as high above that practice as are reporters in any other branch of journalism. However, for years, we have been hearing that sport promoters and the promoters of financial concerns have slipped money to certain reporters, and an investigation should clear the matter up, either to exonorate the newspaper men or reform their practices.

TRAIL BLAZERS OF ADVERTISING

President Roosevelt's Navajo Rug

by Chalmers L. Pancoast

COPYRIGHT 1925 BY EDITOR & PUBLISHER CO.

Chapter XXIII

President Roosevelt's Navajo Rug Membership Card

WHEN Theodore Roosevelt was President of the United States, he was presented with a Navajo blanket which was a big advertisement for Albuquerque, New Mexico.

President Roosevelt on his Western tour had been elected an honorary member of the Albuquerque Commercial Club; his card of membership was a unique publicity stunt. It was a Navajo saddle blanket woven from natural wool, colored in red, white and blue, and bearing the credentials, woven in white and black letters, "The President, Honorary Membership Card, Commercial Club, Albuquerque, N. M., May 5th—1903." The blanket has been an advertisement of enduring value. It is now among the Roosevelt relics. The original design was framed and hung on the walls of the Commercial Club as a memoir of the President's visit.

An interesting incident connected with the presentation of the blanket was that it was the second of its kind made especially for a President of the United States; the first having been given to Abraham Lincoln in 1864.

The blanket was woven by Elle of Ganado, the most famous weaver of all Navajo squaws. She died in 1924 at the age of 90 years. For more than a quarter of a century Elle had her blanket loom in the Indian Museum at Albuquerque and there thousands of Santa Fé travelers watched her card and spin wool and weave her beautiful Navajo blankets.

Elle was the daughter of a long line of Navajo chiefs, and was the most widely known of her tribe. However, she had not much of the spirit of hero worship in her. At first, it did not effect her at all when she was told that she was to weave a blanket for the President of the United States. But when it was explained that the Great Father of our country was to have the blanket, and the great importance of the advertising message to the very biggest chief of all, Elle became enthusiastic.

The design of English letters caused her some very hard work, for she was not accustomed to weaving clock letters in her blankets. The design was made the actual size of the blanket, and the colors and lettering and every line was placed just as the Navajo squaw weaver had to bring them out in the finished blanket. The design was in red, white, blue and black, the outside working in the alternate borders of red and blue to a diamond center reaching with its points the end of the blanket. Within the square of blue was the lettering of the famous membership card for the President.

When she wove the English words into the blanket she understood no word of English. Perhaps she was not the only advertising writer on record who has written famous words of profound meaning of which they knew nothing. Many times I watched the weaving of this strange advertisement, and marveled at her ability, creative genius, and artistic taste.

The visit of the President to the Harvey Indian Building had been extensively advertised. An extract from the Albuquerque Journal-Democrat, May 6th—1903, tells of his visit:

"Mr. Roosevelt was shown through the Indian Curio rooms and he enjoyed every bit of it. He was introduced to Elle, the squaw who wove the blanket. The President gave her a hearty handshake and told her how much he appreciated her work. The little speech was interpreted and pleased the Indian woman beyond expression. Then the President was shown the Indians at work, weaving and making baskets, bracelets and bead work. He took a peep into every case in the curio and was intensely interested."

Elle of Ganado Weaving President Roosevelt's Membership "Card"

Since President Roosevelt was presented with the blanket many celebrities clamored for Elle's blankets. The one woven for Ex-President Taft was notable for its coloring and size. King Albert of Belgium selected an Elle blanket as his choice, from hundreds exhibited on his visit to New Mexico a few years ago.

But the presentation of the blanket to President Roosevelt was an event that gave wide publicity to Albuquerque; to Elle, the weaver; and to the Fred Harvey Indian Museum. Later all the newspaper articles about this event were collected and issued in an attractive advertising booklet. It was illustrated with photographs of, "The President's Blanket and Its Maker"—of "Elle of Ganado and Her Husband." Also views of various interesting corners of the Fred Harvey Indian and Mexican Building which was advertised as containing the largest and finest collection of Indian and Mexican curios in this country.

A most unusual advertising value was attached to the rare collection of Navajo blankets and serapes made many years ago, of exquisite colors and designs; quaint ollas, and tinajas of various shapes and tints; beautiful rose-colored bayettas, soft old dyes and fine weaves.

Transcontinental travelers on the Santa Fé were permitted to stop over and visit this Curio, which was also advertised by its old tapestries and altar cloths, pictures and relics from old Spanish missions; pirates' swords and chests; old candlesticks, chimallos, serapes, Spanish shawls, rebosas and mantillas.

Relics revealing the bloody history of the old Santa Fé Trail were also used in the advertising displays. Old Indian war clubs, spears, arrows and bows, armor, idols, carved prow heads used a century or more ago, were all good publicity material for a territory, a railroad, a hotel and an Indian Museum.

Elle of Ganado was a publicity expert who gave wide advertising to the art of Navajo blanket weaving. She came from a section famous as the home of skillful weavers. She was one of the few Navajo weavers who resisted to the last the temptation to use cheaply prepared dyes on sale at the trading posts, and secretly made her own from berries and roots which she gathered on the reservation.

The black, white and brown colors are natural wool from sheep of these colors. The grey produced from carding black and white wool together. The red and purple wools are dyed from minerals, berries and roots.

The Navajo Indian Blankets have successfully advertised a vast empire, the picturesqueness of the great Southwest; the mesas and desert of the Navajos; the painted desert; the strangest corner of the United States.

These blankets of fascinating designs and colorings, made by a primitive people have been used extensively for publicity purposes. The charming colors and decorative schemes have found a place for ideas in booklets, calendars and all sorts of advertising. Especially is this true of railways and firms doing business in the great Southwest. Next to the cowboy the most conspicuous advertisement of Western life and atmosphere has been the Navajo blanket.

Chapter XXIV

Town Boosting Experts

THE James Boys got a lot of advertising for shooting up towns. The Booster Boys didn't shoot things up, they just got busy and blew up the town knockers. They put life into dead towns, aroused self satisfied communities into feverish action. Making people get up on their feet and wave their arms and shout for their own home town takes some genius, and that is what the Boosting Expert did.

Most people will say a good word for their home town, but when it comes to saying a good word and then actually doing something, well, that is the other fellow's job.

The town boosting wave hits the country about every so often. It is an epidemic of civic patriotism brought on by some keen rambling advertising expert, whose great trick is to tell the other fellow he ought to be a booster and not a knocker.

I have met a number of these advertising experts who are a whiz at warming up the business men of a small town put on a boosting campaign.

The town boosting expert started t ball rolling by writing a series of sledg hammer boost talks which whaled t life out of every citizen, trying to arou him to boost his town.

Then the local Board of Trade, Chamber of Commerce held a Boost Dinner where much enthusiasm for t old town was on tap. Rousing speech were made, everybody was pepped up put the old town on the map. In t heat of the excitement everybody pledg to do something—it didn't matter wh just so it was something.

Somebody proposed a slogan. "Le go. Oh Bo! Let's go and grow," something equally as peppy.

With a slogan on banners and on wi dow cards the next idea is to sell t boosters a large quantity of boost buttons.

One of the most successful town boos ing events I ever saw, and in which took an active part was the schem worked to boom Minneapolis, Minn., bac in 1908.

On April 1, the Minneapolis Publicit Club put on a "Gridiron Foolfest." Eac diner wore a tall fool's cap. While th occasion partook of the traditional flavo of April Fool's Day, all was not give over to jesting. The real purpose of th banquet was to inaugurate a "button campaign to help raise the $100,000 th club was to spend promoting the city.

The five hundred men at the "Foolfest were supplied with 100 booster button in boxes of ten each, to dispose of i an endless chain plan. Each man was t give to each of his friends a box to sel Each button was sold for twenty-fiv cents. In two days the entire city ha been swept by boosters. The generosit of the newspapers in printing ads fre and the street car ads helped to mak the campaign a big success.

All the retail stores were selling booste buttons. Each merchant was provide with window cards and hangers. Eac day the button campaign gathered forc resulting in a vast success.

It was similar to the button campaig carried out in Kansas City, when th great convention hall was built.

The button idea spread over the coun try. Booster Buttons were used by citie and states. The "Button" ad became national idea. It has always been helpfu to any town that wanted to toot its own horn.

The big idea back of the local organization, such as Chamber of Commerce Board of Trade, Business Men's Association, etc., was to advertise—advertise—advertise, which in all its phases was embraced in that single expressive word "boost."

I spent several years adventuring around in the town boosting game, helping organize boosting clubs, writing publicity for membership campaigns in boosting clubs, editorials known as "Sledge-Hammer Talks on Town Boosting," writing articles for such maganizes as Collier's Weekly, Leslie's, and numerous trade journals; writing booklets and circulars giving concisely the attractive features of a town, to be distributed to business houses and to be mailed in their letters.

The job of a town booster was to show a town how to get more business, to develop more enthusiastic citizens, more loyal boosters, to get more factories and more business firms. The only way to get them was to raise money and advertise.

Records Were Hung Up In

New York State

During the Past Year

It is not a mere coincidence that the newspapers of New York State surpassed their previous records in volume of National Advertising carried, while the industrial and commercial interests report a similar condition of prosperity, for 1925.

Advertising in great volume has always been closely followed by business prosperity and it happens with too much persistent regularity to be a coincidence.

Manufacturing and commercial enterprises were never more substantial financially, and have started the present year with a stride that will carry them steadily on to greater advancement.

The steady rise in average earnings of New York State factory workers has continued without interruption and the upward course has persisted through a period of rising employment. The standard of living is higher because of the enormous increase of purchasing power.

The manufacturer who distributes his merchandise has something substantial to sell, but his product is no more substantial than the advertising space offered him by the daily newspapers in his marketing territory.

The New York State daily newspapers offer cooperation that is essential to your plans for distribution and sales promotion. Retail outlets, the requirements of their readers and the extent of their trading area are familiar to them and available to you. Their readers—your consumers—have the utmost confidence in their home papers and are strongly influenced by the advertised offerings of the local dealers.

For greater success advertise in these New York State daily Newspapers

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

Howard Wheeler Made Vice-President of United Features—Gen. Smedley Butler to Write for Newspapers—B. C. Forbes to "Discover" Florida

HOWARD D. WHEELER has been appointed vice-president and general manager of the United Feature Syndicate, it was announced this week by Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press Associations. Wheeler assumed his new duties on Jan. 25, succeeding Tom W. Gerber who is returning to the U. P. business organization from which he was temporarily assigned to handle the work of the feature syndicate.

HOWARD WHEELER

Wheeler, who was formerly general manager of the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, severed his connection with that organization on the expiration of his contract, Dec. 31. Prior to his association with the McClure he was with the Scripps-Howard newspaper interests for nearly eight years, first as editor of the San Francisco Daily News and later as Pacific Coast manager of the Newspaper Enterprise Association. During two years following he was managing editor of Harper's Weekly, going from there to Everybody's Magazine where he remained for five years, first as managing editor and then as editor-in-chief.

The inside story of Gen. Smedley D. Butler's two-year fight in Philadelphia, is about to be told through newspaper syndication. The fighting marine, sailed Jan. 28, on the S. S. Colombia for the U. S. Marine Corps Base at Sandiego, Cal., which he is to command.

During the 26-day sea trip the former Director of Public Safety of Philadelphia will write a series of newspaper articles, to be released through the Bell Syndicate, New York, which will relate, "round-by-round", his battle in the Quaker City. Gen. Butler will not accept any payment for his efforts.

"Every cent that I make from this series," he said, "is to be turned over to a fund, to be managed by five Philadelphia newspaper men, the trust fund is to be used for one thing exclusively—to protect legally and otherwise, any policeman or police official who gets into a jam because he persisted in carrying out his oath of office in the face of powerful political influences."

Inez Haynes Irwin, novelist and short story writer, is writing a weekly series on human events and problems for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate. The series will be illustrated by Raeburn Van Buren.

B. C. Forbes, editor of Forbes' Magazine, and writer on business and financial subjects for the Premier Syndicate, New York, is now traveling in Florida writing stories on that state. The syndicate distributes Mr. Forbes daily stories through Universal Service.

W. H. Johnson, president of Johnson Features, Inc., and Editors Feature Service, Inc., spent this week at the Cleveland office of the latter syndicate.

International Syndicate, Baltimore, reports continued interest on the part of editors in Cross Word Puzzles.

Bell Syndicate, Inc., New York, has obtained second serial rights to a group of short stories by Clarence Budington Kelland, and they will be added to the Bell short fiction service.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward McCullough are parents of a daughter, Eleanore Jayne, born Jan. 6. Mr. McCullough draws the Elsie Janis strip "Hattie and Belle" now appearing in the New York Graphic and other papers.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

William Wrigley, Jr. Company and Liggett & Myers Show Big Earnings —A.N.A. to Meet in May—Western Motor Firm to Extend Advertising

RESULTS of persistent advertising were reflected in the earning statements of two big advertisers this week, William Wrigley, Jr., Company, Chicago, and the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company.

The former concern shows for 1925 gross earnings of $18,246,397, against $17,133,960 for 1924, and net income of $9,146,768 after all expenses and charges against $5,380,414 in the previous year.

Directors of the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company issued the most favorable earnings statement in its history, and declared an extra cash dividend of $1 a share in addition to the regular quarterly dividend.

The Association of National Advertisers is planning to hold its semi-annual convention in Chicago in May, Robert K. Leavitt, secretary, announced this week. The definite date has not yet been decided.

Gordon W. Kingsbury, for the past two years secretary-manager of the Detroit Adcraft Club, has resigned effective Feb. 15. He will become advertising manager of the Kelvinator Corporation and will be chairman of the advertising committee of the Electrical Refrigerator Company.

Newspapers in 11 states in the Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain territory will be used in the 1926 advertising campaign of the Moreland Motor Truck Company, Los Angeles. James Houlihan, Inc., Oakland, handles the account.

W. R. Mills, advertising director of the Great Northern and other railroads, advertising men told the St. Paul Town Criers club at a meeting Jan. 22, that advertising carried on by Northwestern railroads since 1880 has done more than any other agency to bring population, enterprise, and prosperity to the Northwest. It was brought out that the roads having their general offices in St. Paul spend $94,000 monthly in advertising, in addition to the amount spent by railroads running into St. Paul, whose offices are elsewhere.

Because of growth of Wildroot sales last year, the Wildroot Company, Buffalo, N. Y. has announced it will increase its advertising activities during 1926.

W. W. Luedke, formerly general manager of the Cellucotton Products Company, Chicago, has been appointed advertising manger of the Peruna Corporation, Chicago, which recently purchased the Peruna company, Columbus, O.

EL PASO POST IN NEW HOME

Texas Daily Adds New Press and Linotypes—Launched in 1922

The El Paso (Tex.) Post on Jan. 18, moved to its new home at 109-11 South Mesa avenue.

In the pressroom it has installed a high-speed, Duplex-Tubular, 16-page press.

The Linotype battery has been augmented by two Model 8 and a Model 22 Mergenthaler machines.

The Post started publication on Aug. 21, 1922. The founders of the Post had an idea that a four-page daily could be made a success. Everybody "spoofed" them until the Scripps-Howard interests agreed to finance the start.

The Post started publication in a small wareroom outside the business district. Two ancient Model 1 Linotypes were bought for $700 each, including cost of rebuilding. The more ancient Potter press cost $1000. Total installation cost, including salaries, rent and all incidentals was $11,000.

The Potter press has a history. It was one of a battery of Potter presses in the original pressroom of the Cleveland Press. This was the first paper founded by E. W. Scripps. This same Potter printed the first issues of the Minneapolis News, the Evansville Press and the Birmingham Post. It is not through yet.

Pleasure All Ours

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I cannot express too warmly my deep personal appreciation, and I am sure that every member of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, for the very liberal space your publication devoted to the recent meeting of the Society. From the inception of this organization, the attitude of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER has consistently been one of helpfuness, and whatever success the Society has attained is in no small degree due to your generous support. I want also to express my appreciation of the intelligent and helpful work of Mr. Robb during the sessions of the Society.

E. C. HOPWOOD,
Secretary American Society of Newspaper Editors.

ADVERTISING IS NEWS IN NEW ENGLAND
WHERE NEWSPAPERS ARE HOME PAPERS

With a compact population of close to eight million people, the New England States lead the country in many lines of industry—and they lead the country in savings.

The New England people are mostly average men and women, industrious, with occupations and requirements that are diversified.

Millions of dollars a day are spent by them for necessities and luxuries.

The New Englander reads and believes in his newspaper—he reads all the newspaper—he has confidence in it.

Consistent advertising in newspapers of home distribution that command the respect of their readers is profitable provided the manufacturer's merchandising plans permit him to take full advantage of this efficient method of sales promotion.

The National Advertiser or Space Buyer who reads this advertisement was probably not looking for it. Likely the same reader interest that prompted the perusal of the news and editorial columns of this publication induced him to turn to the advertised announcements for profitable information of another nature. He can profit immeasurably by the territorial information and cooperation offered by the New England daily newspapers that submit their circulation figures and national advertising rates in the following list.

U. S. PRESS SPONSORS ORATORICAL CONTEST

About 30 Newspapers Handling Competition Among Students at Secondary Schools—Noyes, Committee Chairman

Nearly 30 American newspapers together with newspapers in England, France, Germany, Canada, and Mexico are sponsoring this year's international oratorical contest, the chief objective of which is to "increase interest in and respect for the basic principles of government in each of the participating nations." In the United States the contest will center around the Constitution.

The competition is open to all students in the secondary schools and will begin with the opening of the Spring term on Feb. 1. It takes the form of original ten-minute orations on the Constitution.

The contest has three aspects—regional, national, and international. The country is divided into seven regions, and the regional winners compete at a national contest in Washington, and the national champion then takes part in the international competition. All seven national finalists will receive as their awards at the national contest, trips to Europe this coming summer with all expenses paid. The national champion will have special recognition in the form of an emblem, and will represent this country at the international final.

Twice before the national contest has been held and has developed wide interest

The American Committee for the National Oratorical Contest are Frank B. Noyes, Washington Star; Adolph S. Ochs, New York Times; Walter A. Strong, Chicago Daily News; William L. McLean Jr., Philadelphia Bulletin; Frederick I. Thompson, Birmingham Age-Herald; R. E. Stout, Kansas City Star; Harry Chandler, Los Angeles Times.

The committee chairman abroad are Maurice Bunau-Varilla, publisher of Le Matin, Paris, for France; Henry N. Hall, London, for England; H. Becker, Ministry of Education, Berlin, for Germany; Miguel Lanz Duret, publisher of El Universal, Mexico City, for Mexico.

The American newspaper sponsors, are the New York Times, Portland Oregonian, Pittsburgh Sun, Dayton News, Canton News, Deseret News of Salt Lake City, Los Angeles Times, Chicago Daily News, Indianapolis News, Philadelphia Bulletin, Washington Star, Atlanta Constitution, Birmingham Age-Herald, Des Moines Capital, Montgomery Journal, Mobile News-Item, Kansas City Star, Mobile Register, Louisville Courier-Journal and Times, Oklahoma City Oklahoman, Miami News, Chattanooga Times, Springfield News, Seattle Times, Rochester Democrat and Chronicle and Hartford Courant.

Union Printers' League Meeting

Progress made in advancing the wage scale was detailed by Fred R. Cornell, of New York, speaking before the quarterly meeting of the Union Printers' League of New Jersey, held at Dunnellen, Jan. 23-24. Another speaker was Seth R. Brown of Indianapolis, representing the executive council of the International Typographical Union. A banquet was given Jan. 23, with honor guests including Charles Sachs, George Beach and Fred Ormberger, representing "Big Six." of New York City.

Executive Changes in Albany

Frank W. Clark, who has resigned as editorial director of the Press Company papers at Albany, the Knickerbocker Press and Albany Evening News, has been succeeded by Walter P. Plummer, for the last three years managing editor of the Evening News. Allen Eddy, for 12 years with the old Bennett organization on the New York Herald and lately with the Syracuse Herald, has become managing editor of the Knickerbocker Press.

Westport Standard Quits

The Westport (Conn.) Standard, started in opposition to the old established bi-weekly, the Wesporter-Herald, has ceased publication. John D. Lawson was publisher. W. S. Jones, with his sons L. J. Jones and E. C. Jones, publish the Westporter-Herald, established in 1874.

W. E. YOUNG, FORMER AKRON MAYOR, DEAD

Thirty Years Ago He Was on Times Staff—Later Had Part Interest —Brother of Harvey R. Young

William E. Young, 63 years old, who died last week at Akron, Ohio, was formerly a newspaper man and until a little more than a year ago associated in the ownership of the Akron Evening Times. He was a prominent attorney in Akron and a former mayor of the city and flags on city buildings were placed at half mast following his death.

Mr. Young, who was a brother of Harvey R. Young, advertising director of the Columbus Dispatch, was born at Mt. Hope, Ohio, and was educated at Ohio Normal University and the University of Michigan law school.

Upon his graduation in 1892, he came to Akron, and for the first year of his local residence was local editor and business manager of the City Times, which later became the Akron Evening Times. He was local correspondent for the Cleveland Plain Dealer for some time.

In 1893 he began practicing law, and that year formed his partnership with Justice Wanamaker.

Becoming active in politics, he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for mayor in 1896, and in the fall elections of that year was the only one of his party to be given a plurality.

It was during his tenure of the mayoralty that one of the most thrilling chapters of Akron's history was written—the riot which occurred here in 1900. During that trying period Young called for troops from the state and quelled a dangerous mob which destroyed the City Hall and Columbia Hall.

Civic and professional affairs claimed much of his time. He was a member of the Rotary Club, and was identified with the American Bar Association, the Ohio State Bar Association and with the Akron Bar Association.

EDWARD H. PAPE DIES

Patent Medicine Manufacturer Was Large Newspaper Advertiser

Edward H. Pape, millionaire proprietary medicine manufacturer, and buyer of large newspaper linage, known as the creator of Pape's Diapepsin and a dozen other patent medicines, died Monday at his home in Cincinnati.

Mr. Pape, it is claimed, a few months ago placed the largest appropriation for newspaper advertising for proprietary medicines ever made. His annual advertising budget is said to have run into the millions, and that virtually every daily newspaper in the civilized world shared in it to some extent.

Scores of advertising men attended his funeral which was held Wednesday.

Mr. Pape was born in Cincinnati in 1877 and in his youth entered the advertising field with the Parvin Doughty Advertising Agency.

Pape, with his brother, Harry, was one of the founders of the firm of the Pape, Thompson & Pape Company, manufacturers of proprietary medicines. About ten years ago the firm was purchased by Sterling Products, Inc., Wheeling, W. Va. Pape occupied the position of advertising director of the Sterling Company. His brother continued to be associated with him. Subsequently they founded the Edward Wesley Company, which manufactured a proprietary product.

JOHN D. PLUMMER

Former Publisher of Springfield (Mass.) Union Dies in Pinehurst

John D. Plummer, 56, former publisher of the Springfield (Mass.) Union, died at Pinehurst, N. C., early Sunday.

Mr. Plummer had been at Pinehurst since Dec. 15. He was confined to his bed Christmas night. Physicians, however, had been satisfied with his improvement until last Saturday.

He is survived by his widow, a daughter, Miss Ruth Plummer, a student at Wellesley, a son, Lawrence, of Long Beach, Cal., and two sisters.

Mr. Plummer was born in Gloversville, N. Y., and educated in the Springfield schools. He entered the business office of the Union as a young man and advanced rapidly, becoming part owner of the paper, with A. L. Langtry, former Massachusetts Secretary of State.

He disposed of his interest in the Union in March, 1923, because of ill health, to George L. von Meyer, who recently sold the paper to the Springfield Republican. Mr. Plummer has not been active in business since that time. Both his wife and daughter were with him at the time of his death.

The body was taken to Springfield for burial.

Underwood, Kentucky Editor, Dead

Thomas C. Underwood, 52, for many years editor of the Hopkinsville (Ky.) New Era, died Jan. 20, at his home in Hopkinsville. Practically all his newspaper career was spent with the New Era, first as reporter and later as editor, which office he held since 1902. He was originator of the "Daily Jots" column in the New Era. In 1910 he was president of the Kentucky Press Association.

$215,000,000—National Newspaper Advertising 1925

1925 closed with the largest volume of national Newspaper advertising in history.

A conservative estimate by the Bureau of Advertising shows the stupendous total of $215,000,000 with a probability of the actual figures exceeding the estimate.

The national advertisers' annual trend toward Newspapers has been steadily up—up—up——for the simple and obvious reason that Newspapers, reaching everybody everywhere and anywhere at anytime, actually sell more merchandise than any other advertising medium.

Yes! the new Intertype "Mixer" IS standardized

The Intertype "Mixer"

THOSE who have seen the Intertype "Mixer" in operation—and realize how much work it turns out—can hardly believe that a machine so radically different can still be a standardized and Interchangeable Intertype.

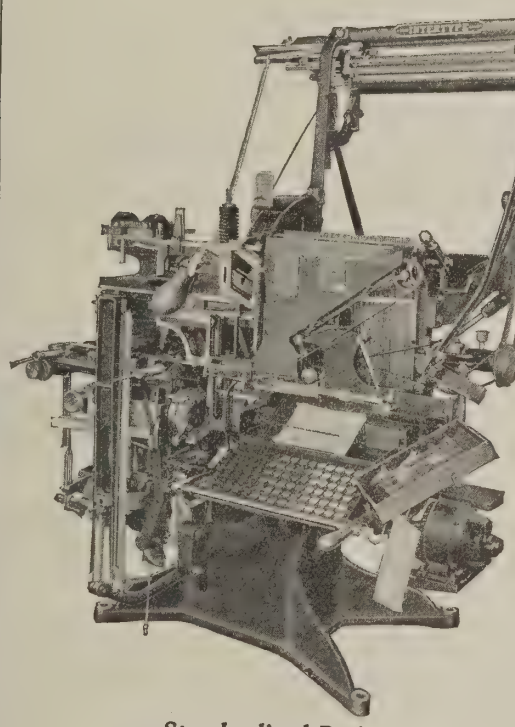
It IS standardized. Its main magazines and molds and matrices will interchange on every other Standardized Intertype ever built.

It is interesting to hear the comments of those who see the new "Mixer" first when it is speeding along on ordinary "straight" composition. "Why, that machine can't be a 'Mixer'; it has only one distributor box." Or, "Where is the special assembling mechanism?—this looks like any other machine."

But when they see the "Mixer" at work on complicated composition—or on work requiring constant changes from one magazine to another—all are amazed at the OUTPUT of this radically improved machine.

Send the coupon on the next page for our new booklet on the Intertype "Mixer." It illustrates many interesting features of the machine and shows practical specimens of its work.

New! Improved!



Don't try to compare the Intertype "Mixer" with any other machine, for there is nothing else like it. No other machine has the same simple assembling mechanism, without restrictions as to speed or large-size matrices. No other machine has anything like the single distributor box feature. The Intertype "Mixer" is built for dependable service under actual working conditions without special expert care.

THE TIMES-PICAYUNE'S continued dominance in advertising is the best evidence that it produces more satisfactory results than any newspaper in New Orleans. Day after day, year after year, shrewd, careful advertisers who demand immediate, definite returns for every dollar they invest continue to show a tremendous preference for The Times-Picayune.

The effectiveness of Times-Picayune advertising is based on the interest and confidence with which it is read in nearly 100% of the able-to-buy homes in New Orleans and vicinity. It reaching BUYING readers and they look upon it as THEIR newspaper.

The Times-Picayune has the largest total circulation, daily and Sunday, the largest city circulation, the largest country circulation—and goes into more individual homes than any other nswspaper or combination of newspapers in New Orleans. It is CIRCULATION WITHOUT DUPLICATION.

Every statement made by The Times-Picayune is subject to check by trained outside auditors reporting under oath. An A B C report with distribution analyzed is available to every advertiser.

The Times-Picayune's unchallenged leadership is not on overnight "dash"—it is the result of 89 years of "Truth in Circulation" and "Truth in Advertising," and advertisers in 1926 will continue to find it the most profitable medium in the New Orleans field.

Advertising

Shattering all former records for total volume of advertising with 19,135,663 lines!

9,757,666 lines of local advertising; 3,212,098 lines of national advertising and 6,165,899 lines of classified advertising makes up the grand total of 19,135,663 lines of advertising carried by the San Francisco Examiner during 1925—showing a gain of 899,862 lines over 1924 and breaking all former records for volume of advertising printed during any one year.

In The Examiner's tremendous excess over all its competitors is found a graphic testimonial of overwhelming leadership. The Examiner led all other San Francisco newspapers in every department of advertising—local—national—classified—printing 7,637,809 lines more than the Chronicle; 9,801,318 lines more than the Call and Post; 11,586,002 lines more than the Daily News; 12,029,032 lines more than the Bulletin and smothered the Herald by 17,320,173 lines.

Circulation supremacy is the guiding factor for this preference in advertising patronage. With a daily circulation in excess of 170,000 and a Sunday circulation in excess of 350,000 The Examiner delivers to advertisers a circulation daily 72% greater than the Call and Post; 100% greater than the Chronicle; 145% more than the Bulletin; 162% greater than the Daily News and 102% in excess of the Herald, and on Sunday leads its only competitor, the Chronicle, by 130%—offering advertisers by far the greatest merchandising potentialities of any newspaper in the Central and Northern California market.

All behind the TIMES

BECAUSE IN 1925 The Buffalo Times carried 3,321,360 lines of department store advertising—564,364 more than the next Buffalo paper. The News carried 2,757,006 lines, the Courier 930,454 lines, the Express 526,618 and the Star 37,758 lines.

BECAUSE IN 1925 The Buffalo Times carried 840,644 lines of Automobile display advertising, 68,642 more lines than the second paper. The Courier carried 772,002 lines, the News 646,338 lines, the Express 514,346 lines, the Star 14,896 and the Post 13,944.

BECAUSE IN 1925 The Buffalo Sunday Times Rotogravure section advertising gained 43 per cent over 1924. This was 80 per cent of the total Rotogravure gains made by the three Buffalo Sunday papers.

BECAUSE IN 1925 The Buffalo Times carried a grand total of 11,603,200 lines of display advertising, 627,738 lines more than any other Buffalo newspaper. The News carried 10,796,426 lines, the Courier 6,760,176, the Express 5,168,870 lines, the Star 1,380,834 lines and the Post 747,180 lines.
N.B. (Times, Courier, Express, 7 issues per week.)

Other "becauses" could properly be mentioned as the Times leads in several other classifications but the above will demonstrate clearly what a well rounded superiority the Times enjoyed during 1925.

In connection with the Times' grand total it is well to bear in mind, that these figures represent just as in former years, more display advertising than was ever run before in any other Buffalo newspaper in any single year. In the past two years the Times gained 1,269,646 lines of display advertising, almost three times more than the increase of the paper making the next highest gain during the same period.

Circulation of Buffalo Evening and Sunday Times now over 105,000

THE importance of The Los Angeles Evening Herald in the advertising field is reflected in its remarkable gain in National advertising the past year—an increase of 371,392 lines over 1924.

182,210 lines more than the combined gains of all other Los Angeles newspapers, daily and Sunday included!

Many successful advertisers cover the entire Los Angeles field by concentrating their appropriations in The Evening Herald alone

WE HAVE THE TOPNOTCHERS

Editors know that McNaught Syndicate does not annoy them with presentation of second-rate features. All headliners. Look over the list.

RUBE GOLDBERG

Preeminent in comic strip art for many years. His phrases have become part of our common language. "Life's Little Jokes," "Bolony," absurd mechanical contrivances. Hilarious nonsense dialogue.

WILL ROGERS

Nothing but Rogers will satisfy the millions of followers of the cowboy humorist-philosopher. Weekly article on matters of current interest. Daily "Worst Story."

O. O. McINTYRE

Daily column of sidelights on New York life. Weekly article with two-column art. No writer has more devoted following all over America.

Here's Important News!

McNaught Syndicate will soon release a smashing new humorous feature by Irvin S. Cobb, King of all the fun-makers.

H. J. TUTHILL'S daily comic strip, Home Sweet Home, and weekly comic page, The Bungle Family, is pulling circulation for nearly a hundred papers. Funny in text as well as in the drawings.

CLIFFORD McBRIDE, the newest sensation in fun. Wordless art, weekly page for tabloids or in half-page form for standard-size papers.

GUS MAGER is doing a daily strip of The Fifty-Fifty Family which touches the homely and human things. It is making hosts of new friends every day.

ROE FULKERSON is producing Andrew and Imogene and The Hotel Stenographer daily, and Sunday Morning Breakfast weekly. Human interest, woman interest, cleverness.

ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE is doing an entirely new series, Tales of Real Dogs. This famous writer's best work. Weekly, with two-column art.

JOHN ROACH STRATON and HUBERT C. HERRING in the religious feature of the hour, The Two-Way Pulpit, weekly. Modernist and Fundamentalist.

Ellis Sunday School Lessons (standard for many years), Glenna Collett writes Her Own Story for golfers. Fatty Lewis in weekly good-humored philosophy for home folk. Will Dilg, The Call of the Outdoors. Carolyn Wells, daily funny story. Opie Read writes weekly Poker Stories, giving glimpses of famous men at play. Don Herold draws a weekly cartoon and writes the humorous text that goes with it.

JULIA BOYD. Three-times-a-week Fashion Service. Three-column art, sketched from life, showing the clothes on real women. While most of the sketches are done in the fashion centers, Miss Boyd also travels everywhere, and frequently sketches women and clothes at social functions in your own town.

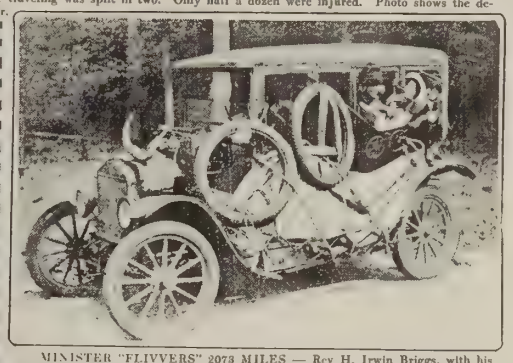
FLOATING A SHIPMENT—This striking photo discloses a part of the dock system of Seville, Spain, entirely under water from floods. Twenty-five American automobiles, imported, are being swept away in their cases, by the swift current.

HOW DRY IT IS! — William E. (Pussyfoot) Johnson, international prohibitionist, is joyfully tackling the task of trying to dry up the U. S. after a trip to Europe where he preached his doctrine. On a former visit abroad he lost one eye as the result of an encounter while speaking.



NARROW ESCAPE FOR 50 PASSENGERS—By some trick of fate no one was killed when the Paris-Basle express was derailed near the French capital. The sleeping car in which the 50 were traveling was split in two. Only half a dozen were injured. Photo shows the demolished car.

COMMUNISTIC REVENGE—Greek Orthodox Cathedral in Moscow, erected by the late czar of Russia, is being razed by Soviet hands to eliminate the last sign of Imperial Russia. Photo shows church in process of demolition.

GREATEST FRENCH SOPRANO—Mlle. Bonavia, member of the French Opera Comique, is coming to our shores for an extended tour of the principal musical centers. The singer is shown garbed in an elaborate stage costume.

MINISTER "FLIVVERS" 2073 MILES — Rev H. Irwin Briggs, with his wife and three children, drove his car from Harrison, Neb., across nine states, two Indian reservations and two mountain ranges to Drew University, at Madison, N. J., where he is to study for three years. The trip took 23 days, 11 of which were spent in repairs and visiting friends.

BOTH THANK COOLIDGE — Railroad brotherhoods and transportation chiefs are giving president credit for help that brought the two to agreement on legislation which would enable them by abolishing U. S. labor board to settle their differences without strikes. Photos show representatives calling at executive mansion to thank the president. L. to r., B. M. Jewel, shopcraft unions; D. R Richberg, general counsel; D. B. Robertson, B. of L. E.; W. N Doak, trainmen; inset is, William W. Atterbury, president of Pennsylvania System.

YOUNGEST LICENSED AVIATOR—In United States, is title claimed by Farman Parker, 14, above, of Anderson, Indiana. He was taught by his father, a pioneer flyer.

TRUE CLEVELAND MARKET

Twenty-Two Cleveland Merchants says it's True!

A representative of The Cleveland Press has just obtained a statement from the 22 largest merchants of Cleveland that 96.1% of their business comes from the people who live within the True Cleveland Market.

The Cleveland Bell Telephone Co. says it's True!

Cleveland business men can pick up their phones and talk to associates in the towns in the True Cleveland Market by giving their local operator the number wanted. A map on the front cover of the telephone directory which enumerates the towns where this service is possible coincides exactly with that territory which is truly the True Cleveland Market! . . . Common sense and business necessity limit the activities of Cleveland business men—and therefore the telephone company—to this territory.

The Audit Bureau of Circulations says it's True!

At the bottom of the first page of the A. B. C. statement of any Cleveland daily newspaper—morning or evening—you will find that A. B. C. defines the True Cleveland Trading territory as that territory within a 35-mile radius of Cleveland.

Editor and Publisher says it's True!

This is what Editor and Publisher, in its "Space Buyers' Guide for 1925" on page 192, column two, under the sub-head "Trading Area" says about The True Cleveland Market: "Cleveland secures 98 per cent of its retail business in a radius of thirty-five miles—the city does not enjoy a commuter business in proportion to most cities of its size."

and The Cleveland Press says it's True!

We say it's true, because every impartial investigation and unbiased trade survey has PROVEN it to be True. And because we know it is absolutely impossible for people who live 50 and 100 miles away to do much buying in Cleveland.

HERE are a few facts to remember when advertising in Cleveland newspapers:

1. The True Cleveland Market — that territory within which advertising in Cleveland newspapers can successfully function—is restricted to a 35-mile radius of Cleveland.

2. In this territory The Press has 191,275 daily circulation — 45,382 more than the leading morning paper, 55,101 more than the other evening paper.

3. The Press goes into the home in the EVENING when buying plans are made.

The Press is the First Advertising Buy in Cleveland

4. The Press has the largest city—largest city and suburban—largest total daily circulation of any newspaper in the State of Ohio.

5. Day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, The Press publishes more advertising than any other Cleveland daily newspaper. In 1925 it published 14,270,228 lines of paid advertising—531,272 more lines than in 1924.

6. The Press has the lowest milline rate of any Cleveland newspaper, and one of the lowest among the large papers in the United States.

America's Third Largest Market

Map of the Philadelphia Trading Area

Embraces 524,404 separate homes. Population, 3,005,090 people.

Advertisers who want their advertising outlay to do them the most good in Philadelphia should read and analyze the facts given below:

Question	Answer
What is the third largest market in the United States?	—Philadelphia
What is the city population?	—1,823,779
What's the population of the Philadelphia trading zone?	—3,005,090
How many separate dwellings in the Philadelphia trading zone?	—524,404
What Philadelphia newspaper goes daily into nearly every home in Philadelphia.	—The Evening Bulletin
What Philadelphia newspaper goes into most homes in the Philadelphia trading zone?	—The Evening Bulletin
What was the net paid daily average circulation of The Evening Bulletin for twelve months ending December 31, 1925?	—524,662 copies
In what Philadelphia newspaper can you buy advertising space at the lowest rate per line per thousand copies?	—The Evening Bulletin
What is the agate line rate of The Evening Bulletin?	—65 cents
What Philadelphia newspaper carries most local retail and national display advertisements?	—The Evening Bulletin
What kind of a newspaper is The Evening Bulletin?	—High class and conservative
What Philadelphia newspaper has the largest circulation?	—The Evening Bulletin
What is the annual business done in Philadelphia, as indicated by the 1925 figures of the Philadelphia Clearing House?	—$29,079,000,000.00
What city and newspaper should be on the schedule of every advertiser?	—Philadelphia and The Evening Bulletin

The above questionnaire is the "acid test" of the Philadelphia newspaper advertising situation.

To get results it is important that your advertising should be in the newspaper that goes daily into nearly every home in Philadelphia, Camden and their vicinity.

CELEBRATING PEAK YEAR OF AMERICAN PRESS

EDITOR & PUBLISHER Statistical Review of 1925 Shows Highest Records in History for Volume of Newspaper Advertising and Circulation—Unusual Year of Readjustment of Press Ownership Constantly Expanding Public Service of Daily Journalism—How to Use This Year Book

IN the 296 pages of facts and figures in this, the EDITOR & PUBLISHER INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK for 1926, the story is told of the greatest year in the history of the American press.

Stupendous industrial advances were scored by the newspapers of this Continent, reflecting generally stable social and political conditions and unprecedented economic activity.

The year 1925 witnessed interesting press development in many countries beyond the seas. There was continued spread of the great American idea of finding and sustaining free expression in print through economic independence founded upon profitable advertising service and large reading audiences encouraged by low copy prices and efficient distribution. In Great Britain, populous centers of South America, Japan, and among some of the nations of Europe which were less disturbed by post-war confusion, advertising science continued in 1925 to make remarkable gains. Prosperity characterized the year among the newspapers of London, in contrast to generally unfavorable conditions in many other industries, and newspapers of South America, Mexico, Central America and in Asia, particularly Japan, were reported as making circulation and advertising gains of a sensational order.

One of the interesting international press developments of the year, on the professional side, was the movement to assemble representatives of the press from all nations, under the auspices of the League of Nations at Geneva, to discuss improved world news communication service for better popular understanding of international affairs and consequent reduction of the hazards of war.

THE American newspaper, according to the law of averages, established peak operating records in 1925. In the advertising department, economic backbone of publishing, our review shows use of paid space by the public to an extent exceeding all previous years. The remarkable fact is that 1925 advertising linage volume doubled that of 1914 and ran a full five per cent ahead of last year. The previous high record was recorded in the marvelous advertising year, 1923.

These advertising linage statistics are based on a calculation made among 107 newspapers in 23 cities. The detailed tabulation to be found elsewhere in this issue covers twelve years of operation and is a proud record of industrial progress, with few equals among the old, established industries of the country.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER again respectfully calls to the attention of the advertising fraternity the serviceability of its Ready Reckoner, an original and regular feature of this number, by means of which quick estimate may be made of an advertising campaign's cost in the United States or Canada.

Advertising rates for newspapers in metropolitan centers have generally advanced according to circulation increases, but our statistics indicate a widespread movement on the part of newspapers in smaller cities and towns to balance rates in proportion to increased operating expense, thus to remedy a long neglected inequality.

In the following pages will be found revised lists of advertising agencies of the United States, Canada and United Kingdom, with information regarding publisher recognition, addresses and space buyers. The names of advertising managers of the newspapers of the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom are available in the revised personnel lists. The special advertising representatives of newspapers of the United States and Canada are separately listed.

By consulting the Ready Reckoner readers will find that 1925 established for the United States the following rates per agate line per million of circulation: Morning newspapers, $2.66; evening newspapers, $3.39; Sunday newspapers, $2.32.

Organized advertising made further important strides in 1925 in America and across seas. There was continued development of the association of clubs, several important conventions and noticeable advancement of ethical standards of practice.

THE year 1925 witnessed the circulation of the average American newspaper, always a dependable barometer of public interest and approval, reach the highest point in history. The paid distribution volume over the twelve months period rolled up the following astonishing totals: Aggregate total daily circulation of the 427 morning newspapers, 12,440,387; aggregate daily circulation of the 1,581 evening newspapers, 21,208,982; aggregate weekly circulation of the 548 Sunday newspapers, 23,354,622.

This broad coverage means that the morning and evening newspapers of the United States provide 1⅓ newspapers for every family in the United States, while the Sunday newspapers produce 23,354,000 newspapers for America's 24,351,000 families, an average of nearly one paper for each family.

Retail prices for newspapers remained generally unchanged during the year. The list of changes will be found in this issue.

One of the important facts revealed by 1925 circulation statistics in the Year Book is that daily newspaper country circulations are not increasing at the same ratio as city circulation. This may be the effect of abnormal postal rates and the "zone system," which publishers have bitterly protested. Certainly the situation merits the careful consideration of every city publisher. The statistics and deductions may be found among the Audit Bureau of Circulations reports in this number.

HOW TO USE EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S NEW TOPICAL ANNUAL INDEX

A NEW service feature of EDITOR & PUBLISHER Year Book is the topical index of the significant trade news and technical articles that have appeared in the columns of EDITOR & PUBLISHER during 1925. This is in response to frequent and urgent requests of readers who keep EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S regular numbers on file for ready reference. The decision to add this feature was finally formulated when a reader informed us that he was painstakingly card indexing every issue of this journal as an aid to his publishing business. Hereafter, readers may keep EDITOR & PUBLISHER copies on file throughout the year and refer to any important trade news development or feature article by turning to the index which will be a permanent department in the Year Book. If you wish to refer to any event or article in 1925 see page 283 of this number. The index, with many cross indexes, points to the date of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER containing the article sought, with number of page noted.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER, responding to the needs of world journalism and international advertising and trading interests, presents for the first time in the Year Book a listing, sponsored by the United States Department of Commerce, of the newspapers of practically all of the nations on the globe, with data calculated to guide advertisers and others in the selection of media. Owing to disparities and uncertainties in circulation records in these lists, the bulk being unauthenticated, circulation figures are omitted, but we have sought to be careful to preserve accurate information which serves to specify reader appeal.

The Year Book section for Great Britain, especially prepared by the London representative of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, is again presented with revisions to date. Another feature of this book is EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S exclusive list of foreign language newspapers published in the United States, with circulations and base advertising rates.

THE year 1925 was remarkable in the annals of American journalism for changes of ownership, consolidations, mergers, reorganizations and financial readjustments, as the statistics in the following pages attest. It was notable, as well, for the number of new newspaper buildings constructed and re-equipment of old plants, many ventures being on an elaborate scale. Broadly speaking, American journalism has rehouse and re-equipped itself since 1914.

THERE was in 1925 the usual annual readjustment of executive personnel of the newspapers of the United States and Canada, as will be noticed in our listing, which is according to states and cities. This tabulation has been made through direct communication between EDITOR & PUBLISHER and responsible executives of all of the newspapers of the United States and Canada, the work occupying the attention of a staff for more than six weeks. We believe our present list is more nearly accurate than ever before, thanks to a double checking system. In addition to the population, circulation, advertising rate and executive personnel data, customarily reported in this widely-used list, the 1926 Year Book gives the names of Sunday editors and sports editors.

IT was a year of light news, contrasted with the dark years of war and those of post-war confusion in industry and politics. Perhaps the leading professional discussion of the year concerned the treatment of news concerning outlawry and criminals. A movement starting in the middle west to censor or segregate such news was interesting as a "stunt," but was not seriously accepted in the profession.

By questionnaire EDITOR & PUBLISHER revealed that the vast majority of newspapers regarded the publication of individual income tax returns as an "invasion of private affairs," which gave encouragement to legislation to cut the publicity feature from the income tax law.

During the year EDITOR & PUBLISHER recorded a number of excellent editorial enterprises, but there was no instance of editorial achievement which might be termed historic. Efficient routine operation rather than brilliant flights of editorial leadership was the ideal generally served.

OTHER important departments, to be located in the Year Book Index, at the back of this number, are: U. S. Senate press gallery, press galleries of the leading state legislatures, list of syndicates catering to newspapers, list of journalism books published during the year, comparative newspaper labor scales, list of newspaper radio broadcast stations, comparative circulations of leading magazines and daily papers, with the cost of space in each and all; newsprint production statistics, and a wealth of handy reference for all engaged in journalism and advertising.

This is the sixth annual publication of EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S Year Book, now an established event in newspaper and advertising circles. This number is approximately 25 per cent larger than last year's issue and as our readers will appreciate contains the largest assembly of data concerning the publishing field ever offered to the journalism of the world.

LINES of Advertising Carried During 1925 By

The Birmingham News

THE SOUTH'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER

A gain of 1,077,426 lines over 1924 or 3,706,440 lines more than the combined totals of the other two papers

During 1925 The News carried more than twice as much advertising as the second Birmingham paper, and three and a half times as much as the third paper. Every lineage record in the history of The News was broken during 1925.

For a newspaper to occupy such a dominant, outstanding position in its field, it must have circulation, reader confidence, good will and prestige. The News has all these. The above figures prove that national and local advertisers know it.

If You Lived in San Francisco You Would Read

The Chronicle

BECAUSE

You'd find the Chronicle's policy is clean Journalism.

It prints all the news and all the truth, but does not seek the sensational.

You'd find the financial news and stock quotations complete to the last detail.

You'd find the field of sports covered in every event and every line.

You'd get all the news while it was still news, and accurately told.

It's the kind of a paper you'd be glad to have your neighbor see you reading.

YOUR WIFE WOULD READ
The Chronicle

BECAUSE

She'd find the most complete society section it is possible to print.

She, too, would find all the news cleanly told as she'd like to have it.

San Francisco women like to say, "I read it in the Chronicle."

She'd find recipes every day prepared by one of the world's greatest domestic science teachers.

She'd find the latest in music, art and literature, with full reports of her favorite clubs.

It's the kind of a paper she'd be proud to have her neighbor see her reading.

That's why so many people in San Francisco read the Chronicle. You'd be only one of many. But you'd be one more of the Chronicle's readers to add purchasing power for Chronicle advertisers.

Don't forget the Chronicle has the best printed Rotogravure Section in America and the only one in Northern California.

The Hartford Times.

"Since 1817—Connecticut's Greatest Newspaper"

1925—ANOTHER YEAR OF ACHIEVEMENT

Total Advertising for 1925 was 13,601,540 Lines

The best possible proof of the hold a newspaper has on its readers is the record of its growth in circulation---particularly if the circulation is secured without the aid of premiums or contests of any kind. The proof of the pulling power of a newspaper as an advertising medium is the continued growth in the volume of advertising carried. In the past five years The Times has shown a steady and substantial growth in both circulation and advertising. The following details prove this statement.

THE ADVERTISING ACHIEVEMENT

These figures show the lineage total for the past five years

Year 1921, Total 9,914,919
Year 1922, Total 10,962,262
Year 1923, Total 12,139,863
Year 1924, Total - 13,260,240
Year 1925, Total 13,601,540

Detail Figures for 1925

Local Display - - - 10,386,609
Foreign Display - - 2,126,044
Classified - - - - 1,088,887
13,601,540

Advertising Rate 13 cents per line flat

THE CIRCULATION ACHIEVEMENT

The Times circulation has been growing consistently as shown by the following returns for past five years:

Average for 6 Months, April 1, 1920 . . 37,324
Average for 6 Months, Oct. 1, 1920 . . 38,117
Average for 6 Months, April 1, 1921 . . 42,537
Average for 6 Months, Oct. 1, 1922 . . 42,772
Average for 6 Months, April 1, 1923 . . 44,077
Average for 6 Months, Oct. 1, 1923 . . 43,674
Average for 6 Months, April 1, 1924 . . 45,532
Average for 6 Months, Oct. 1, 1924 . . 45,125
Average for 6 Months, April 1, 1925 . . 49,566
Average for 6 Months, Oct. 1, 1925 . . 50,354

This is a gain in five years of 13,030
Or a percentage gain of 35%
Present net paid circulation is about 53,000

PRICE PER COPY 3c—$8.00 A YEAR

"CONNECTICUT'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER"

leads all other Connecticut newspapers—six-day or seven-day newspapers—in advertising lineage and net paid circulation by a wide margin. It leads all other single New England dailies in advertising lineage. Few single dailies in the entire country carry as much local display as does The Hartford Times.

Throwing Light on The National Capital—

A Market of Great Possibilities

Washington is not only the National Capital — but is recognized today as the Capital City of the civilized world—gathering within its borders the leading factors in the political, industrial, scientific, educational, social, national and international life.

A point of contact through Washington, not possible in any other way.

The greatest density of population of any state in the Union is in the District of Columbia.

There is a larger population in Washington than in nine entire states.

For 1923 Washingtonians made a larger number of personal tax returns than 28 states.

Only 9 cities of the entire country exceeded Washington in the number of personal income tax returns and Washington paid a greater income tax than 27 states.

Washington is the 5th city in the country in use of telephones as rated per hundred by the Telephone Company. It has 116,136 telephones — or what amounts to one for every 3.9 people.

Washington is the headquarters of many important national civic, political, commercial and industrial organizations—such as—Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Pan American Union, American Institute of Architects, Southern Railway, Daughters of the American Revolution, National Geographic Society, American Red Cross, American Federation of Labor.

All of the above are located in buildings erected for their use.

Washingtonians own and operate upwards of 97,000 motor vehicles—more than are in use in 10 states combined. There's a motor vehicle in Washington to every 3.3 of its adult population.

Although not a manufacturing city of any pretention it has some 500 distinct industries, producing finished products amounting annually to over $67,500,000—and including everything from automobile parts to yeast.

Washington is a city of well-to-do people—the Government's payroll alone amounts to $160,000,000.00 annually—and they spend accordingly.

Washington is an easy market to cover because one newspaper—THE STAR—EVENING AND SUNDAY—completely reaches the field. Practically everybody in Washington reads The Star REGULARLY.

Send for "Facts about Washington, D. C., and its importance as a market."

It gives detailed information about Washington in which you will be interested.

The Evening Star.

Indiana's largest and most powerful advertising medium--a great newspaper

By every test known to novice and expert, The Indianapolis News demonstrates a convincing supremacy, a towering dominance of its field.

Editorially. For fifty-six years The News has been Indianapolis' and Indiana's greatest *news*paper. Its circulation and advertising dominance are founded on sheer merit as a newspaper.

Circulation. With morning and evening competition, The News has a circulation in Indianapolis that exceeds by thousands that of the Sunday paper without competition. In the compact and marvelously rich territory that surrounds the Hoosier capital, The News is circulated daily, by private motor trucks, as far as seventy miles from Indianapolis at the same hour it is delivered by carrier in the city. This unique outside distribution is unsurpassed in the evening field.

Advertising Endorsement. In 1925, The Indianapolis News published 17,897,667 lines of advertising. This is greater than the total of both other daily Indianapolis newspapers combined—six issues a week against twelve. In millines, agate lines, or dollars invested in space, no other Indianapolis newspaper has ever even approached The News. Proof positive of greatest return in sales and profits per advertising dollar!

The Indianapolis Radius, roughly 70 miles in all directions from the center of the city, is the zone of concentrated circulation and influence of The Indianapolis News. The population is 1,992,713. Buying power, standards of living and accessibility to retail outlets are highest. This is one of the primary markets of the nation, and because of the dominance of The News one of the most economical to cultivate intensively.

—in Indianapolis

The year of 1925 brought a change in the newspaper situation

ONE newspaper, THE TIMES, GAINED 2,005,272 lines of Local Display advertising in its six issues per week as against the COMBINED gain of 958,806 lines for ALL OTHER Indianapolis newspapers in their THIRTEEN ISSUES per week.

ONE newspaper, THE TIMES, GAINED 6,796 in daily net paid circulation March 31 to Sept. 30, 1925, while ALL OTHER Indianapolis newspapers LOST.

And that newspaper, THE TIMES, grew from 42,008 in January to 55,709 DAILY AVERAGE NET PAID CIRCULATION for the last quarter of 1925.

FOR many years one Indianapolis newspaper advertised broadly its privilege of carrying the "unabridged" advertising of Indianapolis merchants.

Today that claim can no longer be truthfully made. Indianapolis merchants have discovered in the growing circulation of The Times a profitable field for advertising, and not a few of them are placing the bulk of their space in The Times—a number use it EXCLUSIVELY.

The Times offers direct contact with one-third of the homes in Indianapolis, and the most of these homes can not be reached through any other publication.

Iowa first on these ten counts!

Iowa Daily Newspaper Publishers will help you get distribution in Iowa. They have bound themselves together under the "Iowa Plan." Write for information.

Iowa has a greater per capita wealth than any other state in the Union.

It is first in the number of automobiles on farms.

The value of its corn, oats, horses, hogs, poultry and eggs tops all other states.

In value of farm lands and buildings it is again first.

Iowa also leads in total value of farm products.

It is at the head of the list in combined value of live stock.

The total value of its farm property is far in advance of that of any other state.

In percentage of farm land improved it is the pace maker for the entire nation.

It also has the greatest number of farms equipped with telephones.

Finally, Iowa has a smaller percentage of illiteracy than any other state.

All of which goes to show that one of the best selling mediums for any advertiser is in the daily Iowa newspapers.

First! in AMERICA

In proportion to the population of the city of publication, the circulation of THE DES MOINES SUNDAY REGISTER is the largest in America! No other Sunday newspaper in the United States in a city of 100,000 or more population publishes and sells as many papers as there are people in its home city. The Sunday Register publishes and sells MORE!

The list below was compiled from the Standard Rate and Data Service for November. It includes all Sunday papers having over 100,000 circulation. The circulations given are from the Government Statements or A. B. C. averages for the six months ending Sept. 30, 1925.

Name of Paper	Pop. of City of Pub. 1920 Census	Av. Circulation 6 Mo. Ending Sept. 30, 1925	Per Cent of Circulation Compared to Pop.

A special U. S. census, completed December 24, 1925, shows that Louisville now has a population of 305,936. Greater Louisville, including New Albany and Jeffersonville, on the opposite bank of the Ohio, now has approximately

Since 1920

Louisville has gained over 72,000 population and The Courier-Journal and The Louisville Times have GAINED

27,207 Daily
42,258 Sunday

During the same period the other Louisville newspapers have LOST 15,598 Daily and practically stood still in Sunday circulation.

1925 began the golden age for Live Louisville and it's Biggest and Best Newspapers

With only their own records to beat, these progressive newspapers proceeded to do it with a vengeance--- as always, National SUPREMACY in building Newspaper Circulation!

Outstanding Success Is Never Accidental

HOLLISTER'S supremacy in building newspaper circulation is unrivalled and unquestioned. For several years practically every BIG campaign has been a Hollister campaign. Surely it is no mere coincidence that the publishers of the greatest and most successful newspapers invariably prefer Hollister and, satisfied with his methods and results, invite him to repeat his successes for them! It is because Hollister's organization is larger, more capable, and better trained; it is because Hollister methods are better, more efficient, more dependable; it is because Hollister results are surer, greater and more everlasting.

THE PROOF of Hollister supremacy is in the papers we serve, a few of which are indicated on this page. Like them, you can benefit by a Hollister campaign. You can look forward to a circulation increase ranging from 20 to 35 per cent—the ordinary growth of years but obtained within 10 or 12 weeks through the medium of a sales force of hundreds of prominent men and women of the highest prestige, positions and popularity, who will be organized throughout your circulation territory by Hollister. Such a rapid, bona-fide increase in NEW, prepaid, home-delivered subscriptions naturally brings an immediate and substantial increase in advertising revenue. Hollister can make 1926 your very greatest year.

After so many years of leadership, our regular clientele has grown to such proportions that it naturally keeps us busy a large part of the time, but we are prepared to handle campaigns during 1926 for a few more metropolitan dailies wishing the benefit of Hollister service.

A Million Dollar Press Room

8:15 P. M. Zero hour in the great press room of the Detroit Free Press. Shaded lamps set high in the ceiling throw their rays upon ink stained men making an adjustment here, turning a knob there, grooming the huge intricate machines that actually manufacture this newspaper.

A button is touched and a row of presses a block long roars and thunders into life.

The new home of The Detroit Free Press, formally opened on November 22, 1925, was really built around its remarkable press room. Here more than a million dollars has been spent in machinery and equipment, which consists in the main of twenty-five Goss high speed multiple type presses with a capacity of 504,000 sixteen page papers per hour. In addition to these twenty-five units there is a twelve cylinder multicolor press, printing 25,000 eight-page comics and twelve-page magazines per hour, in four colors. Foundations have been laid in this press room to permit the eventual inclusion of thirty-eight more units identical with the equipment already installed.

The new home of The Detroit Free Press represents an investment of $6,000,000. Occupancy of the new plant represents the eleventh time in 94 years the paper has been forced to seek larger quarters to care for growth and expansion.

Today The Free Press has a plant and equipment that is one of the world's finest, and there is none more efficient in America, made necessary by its remarkable growth in both circulation and advertising.

THE ST. LOUIS STAR

Was the Only St. Louis Newspaper that Gained in Everything!

The St. Louis Star in 1925 was the only St. Louis newspaper to show a gain in everything—circulation and each classification of advertising.

During the six months ending September 30, 1925, this newspaper reached the highest sustained average circulation in its history.

In total paid advertising The St. Louis Star registered a —representing a substantial increase in every department of advertising—local, national, real estate and classified.

GAIN OF 446,358 LINES

Early in 1925, through a spectacular news coup, The Star set up a record for sudden attraction of general public interest that has never been equaled in St. Louis journalism.

In brief, this newspaper has risen to new heights as a factor in St. Louis social and business life. It has established itself as an indispensable element in the sales plan of every national advertiser who expects returns from his advertising investment in St. Louis proportionate to the size and purchasing power of this market.

don't say "Paper"—say "STAR"

LEADERSHIP with CHARACTER

THE CIRCULATION of The New York Times, average daily and Sunday, for the full year 1925, was 386,284 copies, the highest of any year in The Times' history and greater than that of any other New York morning newspaper of standard size. This circulation was among intelligent, thinking, substantial persons, a quality of readers not equaled by any other newspaper.

The New York Times, newspaper advertising leader in the greatest market in the world, established a new high record of 28,200,444 agate lines in 1925. It led in every major classification.

THE NEW YORK TIMES published a greater volume of local display advertising than any other New York newspaper, 16,086,580 lines in 1925.

The New York Times published a greater volume of national advertising than any other newspaper in the United States, 6,282,004 lines in 1925.

The New York Times published a greater volume of financial advertising than any other newspaper in the United States, 2,967,274 lines in 1925.

The New York Times published a greater volume of real estate advertising than any other New York newspaper (nearly twice the total of the second newspaper), 4,763,744 lines in 1925.

The New York Times published a greater volume of automobile advertising than any other New York newspaper, 1,427,502 lines in 1925.

The New York Times published a greater volume of dry goods and women's specialty shop advertising than any other New York newspaper, 6,250,570 lines in 1925.

The New York Times published more rotogravure advertising than any other newspaper in the United States, 905,442 lines in 1925.

The New York Times, because of its censorship, excluded more misleading and objectionable advertising than any other newspaper

Yes,—

BINGHAMTON

Is In the 100,000 Class

Binghamton, Johnson City, Endicott, Port Dickinson and Union are practically one community so far as the national advertiser is concerned. They are all so closely interwoven that it is difficult to tell where one leaves off and the other begins. This community has a population of 110,000 with 258 factories employing 33,000 workers, an industrial pay-roll of more than $50,000,000 and with a manufactured output valued at more than $160,000,000 per year.

Binghamton, the great metropolis of south central New York State, is a great jobbing and wholesale center controlling retail outlets in a large territory.

Binghamton therefore belongs in any advertising campaign which contemplates cities of 100,000 population or more.

The great variety of its manufactured products and the general prosperity of its residents make Binghamton newspaper advertising unusually and quickly responsive.

The BINGHAMTON PRESS, published every evening except Sunday, has over 34,000 daily circulation in this exceptional field. It is known and recognized everywhere as an advertising medium of extraordinary merit, not only because of its large circulation, but its remarkable reader and dealer confidence.

The Merchandising and Promotion Departments of the BINGHAMTON PRESS are especially fitted to assist not only BINGHAMTON PRESS advertisers in distribution problems and dealer cooperation, but to help other manufacturers not already represented in Binghamton to secure jobber or distributor connection as well as retail distribution.

Send for a copy of the BINGHAMTON PRESS AD-VISER—a 16-page publication that will be worth your while.

We will tell you more about the wonderful Binghamton territory, at any time, anywhere.

True to the Traditions of Years The Cincinnati Times-Star Maintains Unchallenged Leadership in Advertising Lineage

In the year ending December 31, 1925, for the eighteenth consecutive time the Times-Star set the pace and broke the record for display lineage in Cincinnati newspapers.

Times-Star leadership remains unchallenged in local and in national display. It is almost double that of the second afternoon newspaper, 2.7 times as great as that of the leading morning newspaper published on the same days and more than twice that of both Sunday papers combined.

Comparative Statement of Display Lineage Published in the Cincinnati Newspapers 1925

DAILY	LOCAL	NATIONAL	TOTAL
Times-Star, P. M.	9,764,153	2,386,433	12,150,586
Post, P. M.	5,125,330	1,322,447	6,447,777

1925 LINEAGE LEADERSHIP IN CLEVELAND, O.

And Again!

CLEVELAND'S Largest Advertisers have expressed, indisputably, their confidence in the value of The Cleveland News as an Advertising medium. During 1925, Cleveland's five largest Department Stores, The May Co., The Bailey Co., Wm. Taylor Son and Co., the Higbee Co., The Halle Bros. Co., combined, placed a greater volume of their Advertising, aggregating a greater lineage, in The Cleveland News than in any other Cleveland paper. Here are the figures:

The Cleveland News	12,325 Columns
The Cleveland Press	9,480 Columns
The Cleveland Plain Dealer	8,372 Columns

News EXCESS over Press,
2,845 columns, or 30%

News EXCESS over Plain Dealer,
3,953 columns, or 47%

Represented by
Geo. McDevitt Company
250 Park Ave.
New York
People's Gas Bldg.
Chicago

THESE stores merchandise, successfully, a large bulk of nationally advertised products. Their knowledge of local advertising media is unquestioned. And they use most space, in Cleveland, where they get best results, in—

1910 FIRST 1925

for sixteen years

AFTER a newspaper has, for sixteen consecutive years, led a highly competitive field in both volume and character of automotive advertising, as The PRESS has done in Pittsburgh, there is little need for that newspaper to prove superiority.

The fact that The PRESS has earned the confidence of the industry, as expressed in terms of dominant advertising lineage month after month and year after year, is proof in itself that this newspaper has brought and is bringing to automotive advertisers results—sales.

1925 was the seventh consecutive year in which The PRESS published over a million lines of display automotive advertising—a mark never yet attained by any other Pittsburgh newspaper.

It has been a conclusive test, as well as a long one, and it proves that The PRESS does reach buyers of motor vehicles and their accessories. A circulation that is 60 per cent greater than any other Pittsburgh paper in the Pittsburgh district alone is one reason for this result.

The Pittsburgh Standing in automotive display advertising for 1925

THE PRESS . . . . . 1,158,019 lines

Second Paper 832,405 lines
Third Paper 750,225 lines
Fourth Paper 303,289 lines
Fifth Paper 148,589 lines

They Dominate in PITTSBURGH

Largest Circulation
Greatest Confidence
Strongest Pulling Power

THE PITTSBURGH POST
THE PITTSBURGH SUN

A greater coverage in the Pittsburgh district than is afforded by any other publishing house is offered to you by The Post and The Sun daily and The Sunday Post.

The daily Post leads in the morning field by 38,000. The combined weekly purchases of the morning, evening and Sunday issues of these newspapers exceed 1,500,000 copies—a figure approached by no competitor.

More important, these newspapers offer you coverage that commands confidence. The people of the Pittsburgh district recognize that The Post and The Sun first of all are newspapers, that they have no axe to grind, that they are reliable in news and advertising alike, that they are aggressive and courageous, broad-minded and public-spirited.

The Post and The Sun are read by men and women who believe in them.

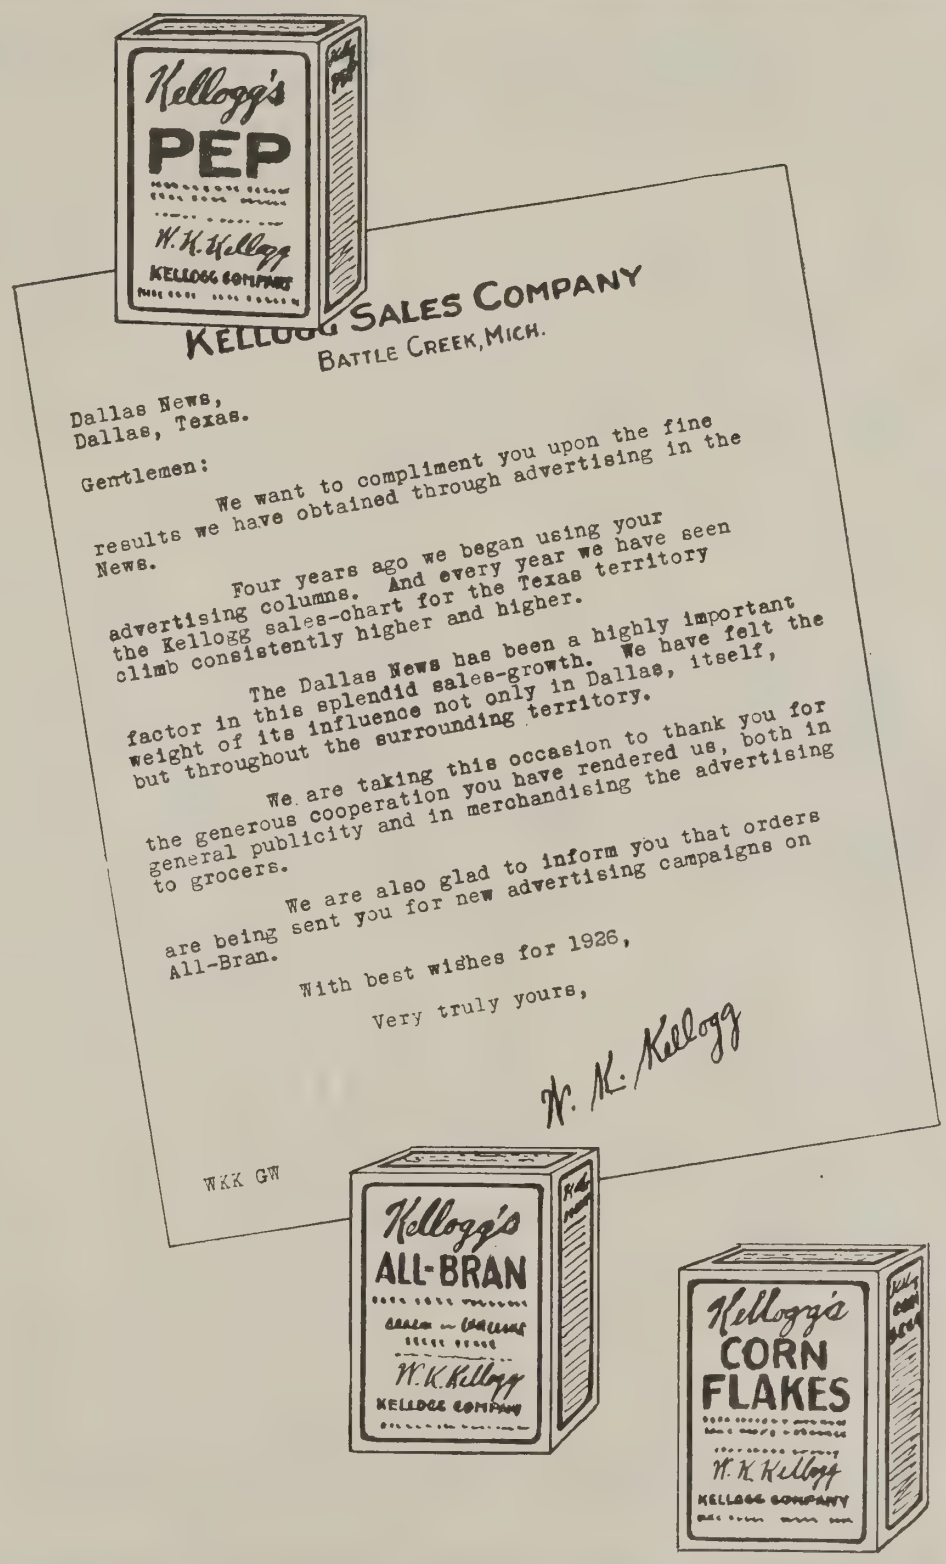
Kellogg's Texas Sales Chart wrote this testimonial for The Dallas News



Four years ago the Kellogg Company—world's largest manufacturers of ready-to-eat cereals—began advertising in The News.

Four years of steady progress and success have been their reward.

A rich market—new, responsive, eager—has welcomed them. A predominant advertising medium has aided them.

1926 will see the Kellogg Company begin new campaigns in The News—bidding for still larger sales in Texas' Prosperity Zone.

One of America's greatest advertisers sets a wise example!

Dallas is the door to Texas and the News is the Key to Dallas

HOW—

The Richmond News Leader

Meets the Three Tests for Dominance

Test I.—Saturation

The Richmond News Leader sells one paper for every 3.78 persons in Richmond. This degree of saturation is only equaled by the Grand Rapids Press, the Kansas City Star and the Binghamton Press and Leader.

Test II.—Circulation

The NET PAID CIRCULATION of The Richmond News Leader for 1925 was 61,998. This circulation exceeds by many thousands the circulation of any other paper published in Virginia.

Test III.—Advertising

The Richmond News Leader carried in 1925—

12,174,582 Lines

—of advertising in 311 days. This was 1,487,668 lines more than the other Richmond paper carried daily and Sunday in 365 days.

TACOMA

THE GREAT LUMBER MANUFACTURING CITY

LIKE its neighbors, Seattle on the North, and Portland on the south, the city of Tacoma, the center of Southwest Washington, has a market well worth the attention of national advertisers.

Tacoma is one of the five major markets of the Pacific Northwest, with clearly defined boundaries. Advertising in Seattle and Portland will not move goods in Tacoma stores. City loyalty is strong in the Pacific Northwest. Local merchants prefer not to stock goods unless manufacturers use space in Tacoma newspapers.

Tacoma's trading territory lies within the flourishing southwestern portion of Washington. It contains 14 cities and towns whose combined jobbers and retailers number 140 and 2,493 respectively.

Tacoma's production of fir doors, wood columns and veneer is the largest in the country. In 1925 Tacoma mills produced 33 miles of doors piled flat. The city has 23 factories which manufacture more than $3,631,712 worth of furniture each year. The Tacoma smelter is the largest on the west coast. Flour mills export annually over 1,500,000 barrels. It has one of the best harbors on the Pacific Coast with 30 commercial docks.

Tacoma's annual manufacturing payroll is over $30,000,000; 1925 bank transactions were $907,919,000; building permits were $9,900,000; bank deposits were $35,000,000, and savings and loan association deposits were $22,000,000.

Tacoma, with 96,965 population by the 1920 census, the present federal estimate giving the city a population of 104,455, is the center of a rich and prosperous trading territory of some 280,000 consumers, 160,000 people living in the city and immediate suburbs and the remainder in the thriving towns and cities in the eight counties that comprise Southwest Washington. This prosperous community is blanketed by

THE TACOMA NEWS TRIBUNE

The newest home of Canada's oldest newspaper

From the old Chateau de Ramesay to the most modern newspaper plant in Canada

The story of 147 years of newspaper publishing

FIRST PUBLISHED on June 3, 1778, as the "Gazette du Commerce et Litteraire pour la Ville et District de Montreal," by Fleury Mesplet, a French printer brought to this country in 1776 by Benjamin Franklin, The Gazette has published continuously for 147 years. Its first home was in the famous old Chateau de Ramesay in the heart of Montreal, and now a museum of antiquities visited by most tourists to Canada's metropolis.

Since then it has had many homes. For four years it was printed in the upper flat of a house on Notre Dame Street, just east of Place d'Armes. In 1837 the plant was moved to St. Francois Xavier and St. Sacrament Streets, where gas for the first time replaced candles as an illuminant. The paper having been acquired in 1870 by the White Family, its present owners, in 1871, the plant was moved to Craig and St. Francois Xavier Streets, where it remained for 36 years until the site was required for the extension of the Post Office.

For 18 years The Gazette was published from the well-known building at 38 St. Antoine Street, now vacated for its newest home, a thoroughly modern building and plant occupying an entire block. It faces on St. Antoine Street, is bounded on the West by Cathedral Street, on the East by Ste. Cecile Street, with a 20-foot lane in the rear.

Although designed for eight stories, the present building contains five stories and basement; the three additional stories to be added as the requirements of the business demand. On the first floor has been installed a new six-unit Hoe press of the latest type, equipped with electrical drive and controllers and latest devices of all kinds. Provision has been made in the press-room for an additional 15 units, making the capacity 21 units in all.

Adequate provision has been made for the most modern equipment in all other departments, including the printing, binding, photogravure, electrotyping and other branches now operated by the Gazette Printing Company, Limited. The paper's business offices will be located on the top or fifth floor, although there will be offices for the convenience of the public near the main entrance.

With this transfer from outgrown quarters to greatly enlarged premises the management of The Gazette looks forward to larger opportunities for genuine public service and a continuance and increase of that gratifying confidence placed in the newspaper by the community and by its advertisers throughout Canada.

In 1925

The Evening Bulletin

of paid advertising

This is a gain of 654,540 lines over 1924, the best previous record. Year after year these newspapers have made a steady gain in advertising patronage — because they produce results.

The reader confidence and circulation dominance of these publications make them valuable mediums for advertisers.

KNOWN CIRCULATION

The Newspaper of Today Is the Most Direct, Acceptable, Completely Covering, Readily Available, Economical and Resultful Advertising Medium Ever Known - - -

Newspaper advertising now, more than ever, demonstrates its immediate availability, its instant adaptability, and its speedy responsiveness. You may talk to every nook and corner of this broad land tomorrow if you like, or you may select your spots and sections, a score, a hundred, a thousand cities and towns, as you desire, or as manufacturing and transportation conditions advise.

We are the National Advertising Representatives of Twenty Progressive Newspapers in that many fine cities of the United States.

Our several offices are the offices of each of those publications, where complete files and data of all kinds concerning both field and publication are in readiness for anyone interested. Our traveling representatives are thoroughly familiar with the publications and the fields in which they circulate.

We are at all times prepared—in conjunction with their respective service departments—to provide valuable and useful merchandise surveys and information reports that will assist the manufacturer of any commodity, either in opening up the territory, or in extending trade already under way.

We bring to the advertising agency an intimate, complete and down-to-the-minute knowledge of market conditions and possibilities and of publicity outlets in the fields we cover, that will enable it to act with the decision, speed and assurance so largely contributing to satisfactory and successful service to its clients.

THE SPOKANE COUNTRY—522 CITIES AND TOWNS
10,000 miles of good roads. 128 passenger trains and motor busses arrive and depart Spokane daily

An Exceptional Market
Highly Prosperous-Spending

AN Exceptional Market—Yes! These facts prove it: The average per family wealth of the 139,000 Spokane Country families is $3,104 above the nation's average. The per capita buying power, based upon income tax returns, is 35% above the average. The Spokane Country leads 18 states in number of income tax returns filed. This section has one automobile to one-one-half families compared with one to two families for the country at large From the above, it will readily be seen that even under normal conditions the Spokane Country's buying power is exceptionally high

Prosperous—unusually so! The farmers of Washington, Oregon and Idaho received for 1925 products $755,000,000 or $150,000,000 more than in 1924 Since the Spokane Country alone produced 1-10th of all the nation's wheat, 1-5th of its commercial apples and large quantities of other grains and fruits, live stock and wool, naturally this section is enjoying the lion's share of agricultural prosperity of the Pacific Northwest. Aside from this, the 1925 output of the Spokane Country mines and lumber mills exceeded $110,000,000, showing a substantial gain over preceding year Therefore, conditions were never more favorable for intensifying sales efforts here than right now

Spending freely—Yes! Careful estimates based upon present sales activity records indicate that the prosperous families of the 522 cities, towns and rural districts of the Spokane Country will spend with the Spokane city merchants alone over $130,000,000 during 1926

th 564,000 Consumers reely!- but Intelligently!

High standard of living! Spokane Country people buy largely as the Spokane city people buy Adding purchases that Spokane Country consumers will make from merchants in their hustling home towns, to their bill bought in the city, together with purchases of Spokane city residents, it is estimated that the retail business in this section will exceed $300,000,000 for 1926.

Buying intelligently—Yes! While Spokane Country consumers have the money and are spending freely, it is significant to note that many exhaustive market surveys prove conclusively that they are unusually responsive to products of merit advertised through their daily newspapers

With these facts in mind, it is easy to understand why Go-Getters among national advertisers and agencies placed 500 000 lines more business with THE SPOKESMAN-REVIEW and SPOKANE CHRONICLE during 1925 than 1924 and why they are intensifying sales efforts here during the present year

Well worth winning completely! Spokane and its rich surrounding territory make up one cohesive market of 564,000 consumers Most of the 89,000 circulation of THE SPOKESMAN-REVIEW and SPOKANE CHRONICLE is confined to the 97,487 homes located in the 522 cities and towns of the field—truly an unusual coverage of an unusual market!

Wood Dry Mat Service

AT YOUR SERVICE

Wood Flong Corporation is the only manufacturer of dry mats that maintains a force of expert dry mat stereotypers who are also thoroughly acquainted with the mechanics of the composing, press and engraving rooms. This force is traveling constantly at no cost to our customers and has done wonders in improving the printing of newspapers.

The price of the standard WOOD DRY MAT is 12 cents. It is not only the original and best dry mat but is by far the cheapest.

Wood Service to the foundry, furnished gratis, makes the cost of the WOOD DRY MAT almost nil.

Every newspaper manager, whether employing Autoplates or not, knows what the name WOOD stands for in newspaper stereotyping. So look for it on dry mats.

Circulations Resume Upward Course With Rates Barely Keeping Pace

Distribution of Evening and of Sunday Newspapers Show Marked Gains Over That of a Year Ago, While Morning Papers Have Slight Gain Despite Many Mergers—Net Loss of Six Papers During Year

OPINION was general as 1925 closed that newspaper advertising rates had risen at a record rate and to new heights. Buyers of advertising grumbled. Newspaper publishers and solicitors agreed that rates were rising (with certain exceptions) and that they should rise and continue to rise. Adolph S. Ochs told the Advertising Club of New York early this year that newspaper rates were far too low and that they were decreasing, rather than increasing, according to the proportion of service rendered.

Mr. Ochs held the correct view, according to the annual tabulation of newspaper circulations and rates by EDITOR & PUBLISHER which is printed on the next page and according to the calculations from that tabulation which are boxed on this page.

The rate per line per million circulation, a fair yardstick for the measurement of newspaper rates on the whole, no matter what may be thought of its merits in individual cases, is rising slowly, very slowly. The increase in the basic rate of newspapers is hardly more than keeping pace with the circulation growth. There has been no increase as yet designed or able to check the heavy purchases of newspaper space by advertisers.

Many increases in the rates of individual newspapers have been noted during the past year, most of them occurring in the ranks of the smallest daily newspapers. Publishers of these newspapers have, speaking generally, clung to old customs, including that of selling advertising by the inch and charging 20, 25 or 30 cents an inch for their space. The new rate cards of these papers reveal that the agate line is supplanting the inch as the unit of measurement of national linage and that the new rates are designed to produce a net revenue comfortably higher than that brought in by the traditional schedule. The comparatively few newspapers which retain the inch as the inflexible unit for all advertising appear to believe that they gain by charging as a full inch all fractions of space more than half of a column inch. The success of such a rule applied to national advertising is doubtful. The data on which the Ready Reckoner (on page 118) is based are:

1. Circulation of all daily newspapers of general circulation, for the 6 months ending Sept. 30, 1925. Where Publishers' Statements to the Audit Bureau of Circulations are available, the figure is taken from them. In other cases, the average given in the semi-annual statement to the Post Office is used. In Canada, A. B. C. figures are used almost exclusively, the other figures being based on sworn statements by the publishers.

2. Advertising rates quoted are those charged per agate line on national advertising contracts. The minimum rate is quoted, usually that applying to 5,000 line contracts.

3. For the sake of uniformity, the population figures in the Ready Reckoner are those of the U. S. Census for 1920. In the directory of newspaper personnel, circulations, and rates, which starts on Page 20 and runs to Page 107, the population figures are the publisher's estimate of his city's population furnished to the Audit Bureau of Circulations, wherever such figures are given, and the 1920 Census figures where later information is not obtainable.

The trend of the business is indicated briefly, if not fully, in the box below, which covers the fluctuations in number of newspapers, their total circulations, total advertising rates, and rate per line per million circulation during the past five years.

Morning newspapers, it appears from the summary, are 427 in number, two less than a year ago, and exactly the same as they were five years ago.

Evening newspapers are now 1,581, four less than a year ago, and 20 less than five years ago.

Sunday newspapers, now 548 in number, are nine more than a year ago and three more than five years ago.

The decrease in daily (morning and evening) newspapers is marked, despite the great activity in Florida, which has doubled the number of newspapers in that state during the year. The process of consolidation continues, accelerated rather than checked despite its inroads into the newspaper ranks during the past decade. Florida added approximately 25 new titles to the roster, yet the net number of newspapers is 6 less than it was on December 31, 1924. The outstanding consolidation of the year was that of the Philadelphia North American with the Public Ledger.

Despite that consolidation and scores of others, and of suspensions without consolidation, the circulation figures continue to grow.

Morning newspapers now show a total average net paid daily circulation of 12,440,387 copies, a gain of 75,000 copies over the average of a year ago, and a gain of approximately 2,300,000 copies during the past five years.

Evening newspapers now average a total net paid daily circulation of 21,298,982 copies, a gain of approximately 664,000 copies over the total of a year ago and about 3,000,000 ahead of five years ago.

Sunday newspapers now circulation an average weekly net paid total of 23,354,622 copies, a gain of 1,130,000 copies over last year's total and approximately 4,300,000 ahead of five years ago.

Total advertising rate per agate line for morning papers is $33.195 a decrease of 38.6 cents from that of a year ago and an increase of $7.243 over the total of five years ago.

Evening papers now show a total advertising rate of $72.373 per agate line, an increase of $3.877 over that of a year ago, and of $12.364 over that of five years ago.

Sunday newspapers now have a total advertising rate of $54.243, an advance of $3.135 over a year ago and of $9.99 over that of five years ago.

The rate per line per million circulation of morning newspapers is $2.66, a decrease of 5 cents, or 1.84 per cent from that of a year ago, and an increase of 7 cents or 2.7 per cent over that of five years ago.

Evening papers now have a rate per line per million circulation of $3.39, an increase of 7 cents or 2.17 per cent over that of a year ago and of 10 cents or 3.4 per cent over that of five years ago.

Sunday newspapers continue to have the abnormally low million rate of $2.32, an increase of 3 cents, or 1.31 per cent over that of a year ago, and exactly even with that of five years ago.

The number of rate increases scheduled to become effective as of Jan. 1, 1926 and at other periods early in the year are not reflected in this tabulation, and their effect will probably be counterbalanced by increases in circulation before the next calculations are made, on the circulations for the six months ending March 31, 1925. That has been the experience of EDITOR & PUBLISHER in past tabulations of this kind. The rate increases which seem large as the new rate cards pass the spacebuyer's desk become adjustments on circulation increases. Some newspapers in large and medium-sized cities, in fact, have arrangements on local contracts for increasing the basic rate every ninety days, or every six months, a stipulated increase being provided for a given gain in circulation.

Creation of a plan which would insure to the publisher an immediate, rather than a delayed return on his circulation increases, and which would not disarrange the delicate structure of national advertising in newspapers is worth the thought of some of the rate-making geniuses of the business. In the mass, its lack is not greatly felt.

The World — NEW YORK — The Evening World

Nearly a Million-Line* Gain in 1925!

THE EVENING WORLD closed the year 1925 with a gain of 993,294 lines of advertising, one of the largest increases in its history.

*993,294 to be exact

It is all the more notable that this gain of 12.6% came at the climax of a two-year period marked by the most sensational changes New York newspaperdom has ever known in a similar length of time.

Undisturbed by mergers and consolidations that destroyed many years of advertising good-will, purchased during decades in papers that suddenly ceased to exist, THE EVENING WORLD has forged steadily ahead until it occupies to-day a commanding position among the evening advertising mediums of the greatest retail market in the United States.

Nothing more clearly demonstrates a newspaper's value as an advertising medium than the use which is made of it by the great merchants of the community that it serves.

The record in the adjoining box is therefore of utmost significance to the user of small space as well as the user of large lineage. Further than that, it serves as an important guide for the national advertiser who must depend on these very stores for his greatest distribution.

How the Great Merchants of New York Use THE EVENING WORLD

DURING 1925, the large stores listed below used 4,541,914 lines of space in THE EVENING WORLD. This represented a gain of 872,993 lines over the space used in 1924, by far the greatest increase in department store lineage shown by any paper, morning or evening, in the city.

This represents the matured judgment of the most important group of merchants in America.

THE EVENING WORLD'S total Dry Goods gain of 878,142 lines is more than double the combined gains in this classification of all other evening newspapers. It is within 10,000 lines of the combined Dry Goods gains of the entire morning paper field.

In Men's Wear advertising, another test of a newspaper's virility, THE EVENING WORLD'S gain was double that of its nearest competitor, and 10,000 lines greater than the combined gains of the evening paper field.

Merchants who know, who place their advertising upon the most carefully recorded experience, who expect action within twenty-four hours of the appearance of a piece of copy are increasing their space in THE EVENING WORLD more rapidly than in any other paper, morning or evening in Greater New York.

The Year's Best Short Stories

At The New York World's invitation the editors of sixteen of America's leading magazines have each selected the five stories they liked best among those they published during the year. From these a committee of newspaper editors has selected—

The Sixteen Best Short Stories

Among them are fine new tales by such celebrated writers as

Booth Tarkington	Peter B. Kyne	Struthers Burt
F. Scott Fitzgerald	Wilbur Daniel Steele	Achmed Abdullah

Practically all the newspapers that published last year's stories thus selected, found them so satisfactory that they are listing them this year.

This was the outstanding newspaper fiction feature of 1925. Some territory is still available for 1926. If you wish to use these fine fiction stories by famous authors as circulation builders, write or wire The New York World Syndicate at once.

The World — NEW YORK — The Evening World

"If a newspaper is to be of real service to the public it must have a big circulation. First, because its news and comment must reach the largest possible number of people; second, because circulation means advertising, advertising means money and money means independence." —Joseph Pulitzer.

The World Is Successful

BY the tests set by its founder, The World is a most successful newspaper. Costing three cents, it is read in at least 45,000 more homes in New York City than its nearest two-cent competitor. Last year it published a larger number of advertisements than any other newspaper in America.

So flourishing is The World, both in regard to circulation and advertising, that two great, new octuple presses have just been installed in the Pulitzer Building and five additional ones will soon be set up. Thirty-seven additional linotypes—machines for setting type—have also been found necessary.

In its publication of "Want Ads" The World has long been supreme. The World's "Want Ad Section" is the greatest labor exchange that exists anywhere.

Business men and statisticians keep constant watch over this section, for it is an unfailing barometer of trade conditions. When "Situations Wanted" exceed "Help Wanted," they foresee trouble coming. When "Help Wanted" are greater in volume than "Situations Wanted," it is indisputable evidence of prosperous times.

Not only in the smaller advertisements, but in display advertising as well, is The World successful. Recently, within a period of eight days, there were these three records broken:

On Oct. 8, The World carried 200 columns of advertising, the largest lineage ever carried in a regular Sunday issue.

On Oct. 11, The Sunday World printed 673 columns of advertising, the largest lineage ever carried in a regular Sunday issue.

On Oct. 16, The Evening World broke all existing advertising records of 38 years with a total volume of 262 columns. It closed the year 1925 with a gain of nearly a million lines of advertising.

Far too often, the newspaper that comes into the home is a matter of haphazard selection. Few people bother to analyze why they read a particular journal, yet the newspaper to-day—read in every home—is a dominant factor of American life.

More than any other influence, more than the admonitions of parents or the instructions of teachers, the newspaper contributes to the formation of the ideals of the next generation.

The World offers the advertiser a newspaper that is accurate, a newspaper that is independent, a newspaper that is effective, a newspaper that is interesting, a newspaper that is enterprising, a newspaper that is successful.

FINDING A MARKET THROUGH DAILY PRESS SPACE

Hypothetical Case of an Advertiser Who Learned the Great Lesson That All the People Read Newspapers—How to Map a Campaign to Sell Goods at Low Cost With Controlled Expenditures

"QUINTO" had been on the market for a year and a half. Full pages in beautiful color had been used in several magazines whose solicitors had talked eloquently of "influencing consumer demand" and the great "dealer influence" that was synonymous with their media. The advertising manager had almost come to believe that no grocer could open his shop in the morning if he had not read the night before of the new substitute for coffee in the Great National Weekly. The household heads were enthusiastic, constant, and devoted readers of the same G. N. W. and one could almost calculate the numbers in which they would descend upon the educated dealer in foodstuffs, demanding their weekly ration of "Quinto." "Consumer Pressure" plus "Dealer Influence"—that was the combination which meant "Sales." The solicitor said so, the advertising agency nodded "Yes," the president, and the four vice-presidents, and the secretary and the treasurer kept time with the assenting muscles, and the advertising manager was almost convinced.

That was eighteen months past.

The campaign in the Great National Weekly and several other publications—one or two grocery trade journals, a chain store magazine, and a small schedule in a monthly magazine which had claimed great powers over the domestic affairs of the nation—the campaign was well under way. The first year's advertising bills had been higher than expected. Unforeseen expenses in the matter of copy and art had been met. Printing of "dealer helps" and window display sheets had cost more than the agency had estimated and the directors had appropriated. The advertising manager, still almost convinced, obtained the deficiency appropriation and sat silent as the second year's campaign was mapped out, substantially along the lines of the opening attack, for the first six months at least. It was still too early in the fight to change tactics, the agency argued. The habits of the "Consuming Public" could not be changed in a month or a year. Headway was being made. Sales were increasing. A definite impression had been made upon the public mind. Prestige was being established.

Six months more passed. Orders continued to arrive daily from the salesmen. They were smaller orders, as a rule, than had been the rule a year before. Salesmen reported resistance. Customers who took the package of delicious beverage compound once usually came back regularly for new supplies, but old customers moved away and new customers for "Quinto" did not take their places. So the storekeepers told the salesmen and the salesmen told the sales manager. Some of the salesmen added that the advertising was not pulling its weight. The sales manager told that to the advertising manager and the advertising manager said nothing. It was his turn to nod.

The board of directors were meeting to consider the future. Unless revenues were increased, expenses must be cut, and quickly. The advertising manager knew from his own experience and that of friends in similar posts that advertising campaigns are especially vulnerable when retrenchment was the spirit of the hour. He had expected this crisis. He had talked against an ambitious campaign in the magazines two years ago, before a line had been printed, or even planned, and found himself hopelessly outnumbered. All of the officers, stockholders in the new company like himself, were solidly in favor of the color appeal and the prestige that a campaign in the Great Weekly would command.

So mused the advertising manager as he waited for the board of directors to assemble. "Quinto" was salable. It appealed to people wherever coffee was a popular beverage. It possessed the flavor that workingmen and commuters demanded in the breakfast cups and it left none of the after effects that the physicians ascribed to excessive consumption of the caffein drug. People who tried it liked it. The repeat orders proved that. The package was attractive and the retailers had given it good display. The advertising had been constant, consistent, conservative, and convincing in its copy and illustration. So reasoned the advertising manager, as he marshalled his thoughts for the meeting.

The product and the advertising were apparently all that could be desired, still the goods moved so slowly to the consumer that the factory faced a financial crisis. Possibly the directors could now be convinced that the excellent, consistent, conservative, convincing, advertising copy was not reaching the right people, or a sufficient number of them. The advertising manager knew two years ago that it would not, could not, through the channels elected. Coffee and its surrogates were the beverages of rich and poor alike, and of all who could be called neither rich nor poor. No manufacturer ever kept the sheriff away by selling groceries to the rich. Many had found the pennies of the poor a Golconda.

The poor did not read the Great National Weekly. At least the solicitor never mentioned them, nor did he allude more than casually to those who could neither be called rich nor poor. His talk was of the purchasing power of his readers, of six-cylinder cars, oil-burning furnaces, hardwood floors, stoves for two-car garages, and other knick-knacks of civilization which they bought after their weekly perusal of its high-priced fiction, success epics, and colored advertisements. The two million readers who bought these goods and services were the natural prospects for "Quinto—The Doctor's Favorite Drink."

There they were, two million and then some, of natural prospects, yet the sales charts showed smaller totals every week. The board of directors were paying for the two million copies of the magazine that went forth every week. Also for the several hundred thousand that read the other publications being used. Half a million dollars a year! It was almost sufficient grounds for the appointment of a lunacy commission, mused the advertising manager.

Well, the board would not listen to him now. He had the idea. No half million dollar campaign was part of his plan. No more fancy four-color sheets for window display. No more dealer helps which the dealer could feed to the baling machine. Nothing like that. The advertising manager would show the board how to invest its money in sales, not spend it in advertising.

First of all, as soon as his plan was approved, he would have the sales force called in. He would tell them of his well-knit campaign, concentrated its territories, with copy as good as had been used the past year and a half, if not better. Full pages would appear in selected newspapers in the territories elected for development, followed by smaller space as the campaign took hold. Retailers read their local daily newspapers, advertised in them, sometimes loved them, sometimes fought with them, but read them, day after day. So did their customers. The salesmen would not be talking about fancy colors, but about something that was the daily life of the men they called upon. The first campaign would be in New England.

The list of papers was not yet completed. No definite estimate of the cost was yet available. Never mind that. Here, according to the EDITOR & PUBLISHER INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK, it was possible to buy adequate space in every one of the 142 daily newspapers circulated in New England for 25 per cent of what the present "national" campaign was costing. An agate line of space in each of these newspapers, whose combined circulation was more than 3,000,000 daily and 1,760,000 Sunday, could be bought for $9.13. Ten thousand agate lines, or four newspaper pages, could be had, commissions and discounts all paid, for $91,300. It would pay, too, the advertising manager knew from the experience of other advertisers who had made their entry into the field of national distribution through the Boston and New England market. Yet, such expenditure would be foolish and reckless. The same money could be made to go much further by proper selection of cities and media. An adequate campaign to introduce the goods and have them generously stocked would cost no more than $50,000, he reasoned, leaving an ample margin for extension if the sales from the territory justified expectations of expansion.

A campaign among the multitudes in New York and New Jersey, where 167 dailies circulate more than 6,600,000 copies a day and almost 5,000,000 on Sunday could be bought at the rate of $17.46 per agate line in each and every one of these newspapers.

In the Central States, where 516 dailies have a net paid circulation of 8,600,000 copies every issue, an agate line in all of them costs $24.64.

The same story unfolded for every territorial market in the country. The half million dollars that had been spent for prestige and beautiful colors would have made "Quinto" a household word in the homes of more than half the population of the United States had it been spent a little at a time in territories where the pick of sales force could center its efforts while the advertising was being published. The talk would not have been of dwindling sales but of obtaining new capital for factory enlargement.

Revenues come quickly when newspaper advertising accompanies a sales campaign of the kind that our force can conduct. There are no uncertain costs and no unknown quantities. Costs are always in hand and can be increased or decreased as the job requires.

"We'll buy sales, not prestige, during the next few months, at any rate," the advertising manager muttered as he knocked out his pipe and entered the board room.

Over 29,000 more families

The Net Paid Average of

THE BALTIMORE NEWS

For December, 1925, was

a gain of over 13,000, compared to a year ago. This gain is no mere happening, but a further expression of Baltimoreans. THEY WANT THE BALTIMORE NEWS IN THE AFTERNOON.

THE

Baltimore American

CHARACTER QUALITY AMERICA FIRST ACCURACY ENTERPRISE
AN AMERICAN PAPER FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

in December, 1925, had a net paid of nearly 57,000—or a GAIN of 15,893 over December a year ago. And that did not just happen, but is a reflection of the DESIRE of Baltimoreans for the Morning American.

The total increase of these two papers sold separately (or in combination, at a saving), with their low factor of duplication, gives now over 29,000 more families served. And The News and American, because of SMALL DUPLICATION and because they serve TWO markets ONCE, and NOT ONE MARKET TWICE, serve several thousand MORE families than any other combination in Baltimore.

And, too, these newspapers, with a strong retailer acceptance, are ABLE and WILLING to CO-OPERATE to make the manufacturer's advertising a rattling GOOD investment.

A DISCRIMINATE sense of value might prompt any business man who retains a Public Accountant to inquire with due propriety as to what he may expect to receive in exchange for the liability which he incurs.

He receives in return only that amount of knowledge, judgment and skill contained in the concept of Accountancy held by the man doing the work.

Newspaper Publishers will find in my organization, men trained in their own line of endeavour.—Men who understand the ethics of the publishing business—Men to whom you can talk understandingly of your troubles.

The good will of my practice has been built up through a personal service of the highest type, gained through experience in the practice of accountancy over a great many years.

This organization, built around a Federal tax specialty which has produced thousands of dollars in refunds for newspaper clients is available in a consulting capacity or to do the actual work of auditing, installation of up-to-date accounting systems or entire reorganization of all departments of a newspaper.

An adequate accounting system telling you where your money goes—will increase profits.

CITY, COUNTRY, SUBURBAN, BULK AND NET PAID AS SHOWN BY A. B. C. REPORTS

A Complete List of Daily Newspaper Members of the Audit Bureau of Circulations With an Analysis of Each Paper's Circulation as Given on Page 1 of Its Report to the Bureau for the Six Months Ending Sept. 30, 1925

DAILY newspapers of the United States are not increasing their country circulation at the same rate that they are adding to their distribution in the city and suburban areas, it appears from an inspection of totals taken from the annual analysis of A. B. C. figures which appears on the following pages.

That is a generalization. It might be significant, or it might be indicative of merely a temporary phase, or of local conditions in a metropolitan area where adjustments are occurring following one of the many newspaper consolidations of the past few months. Taken in connection with the repeated statements of newspaper publishers that present postal schedules are making impossible the normal attention to country circulation, the generalization merits close study by newspaper publishers and the Congress before new postal legislation is enacted.

Here is the situation in brief:

Two years ago, as of Oct. 1, 1923, 249 U. S. English language morning newspaper members of the A. B. C. certified their distribution as follows:

City Circulation	5,735,837
Suburban	2,172,604
Country	2,449,687
Total net paid	10,374,886

One year ago, as of Oct. 1, 1924, 246 U. S. English language morning newspaper members certified to the A. B. C. this distribution:

City circulation	6,071,154
Suburban	2,307,343
Country	2,531,180
Total net paid	10,985,716

This year, as of Oct. 1, 1925, 255 morning newspapers of the above-named class certified their distribution to the A. B. C. as follows:

City circulation	6,455,687
Suburban	2,380,261
Country	2,646,663
Total net paid	11,512,960

The city circulation of these papers, at their latest showing, is 12.5 per cent above that at Oct. 1, 1923, and 6.3 per cent ahead of the total of Oct. 1, 1924.

Suburban circulation, as of Oct. 1, 1925, is 9.5 per cent ahead of the showing at Oct. 1, 1923, and 3.1 per cent above the figures of Oct. 1, 1924.

Country circulation, as of Oct. 1, 1925, is 8 per cent above that of Oct. 1 1923, and 4.5 per cent ahead of Oct. 1, 1924.

U. S. English language evening newspapers numbered 571, as of Oct. 1, 1923, and they were circulated as follows:

City circulation	10,650,442
Suburban	2,925,740
Country	2,185,324
Total net paid	15,873,229

As of Oct. 1, 1924, the distribution of these papers, then 577 in number, was as follows:

City circulation	11,268,657
Suburban	3,114,670
Country	2,183,768
Total net paid	16,738,987

In the present tabulation, with 615 newspapers, as of Oct. 1, 1925, the distribution is:

City circulation	12,105,429
Suburban	3,375,668
Country	2,217,605
Total net paid	17,748,973

City circulation of these papers shows an increase of 13.7 per cent over the 1923 figures and an increase of 7.4 per cent over 1924.

Suburban circulation increased 15.4 per cent over 1923 and 8.3 per cent over 1924 figures.

Country circulation increased only 1.4 per cent over 1923 and 1.5 per cent over 1924.

Sunday circulation of 336 U. S. English language newspapers, as of Oct. 1, 1923, were distributed as follows:

City circulation	9,516,513
Suburban	3,601,532
Country	6,524,902
Total net paid	19,663,110

As of Oct. 1, 1924, the distribution of 315 Sunday newspapers of this class was:

City circulation	10,050,631
Suburban	3,738,852
Country	6,669,561
Total net paid	20,479,360

As of Oct. 1, 1925, the distribution of 327 Sunday newspapers of this class was:

City circulation	10,306,673
Suburban	3,907,407
Country	6,815,197
Total net paid	21,060,319

The gain shown by the 1925 figures over those for 1923 in city circulation is 8.3 per cent, and it is 2.5 per cent over 1924.

In suburban circulation, the gain of 1925 over 1923 is 8.4 per cent and over 1924, the gain is 4.5 per cent.

Country circulation for these Sunday newspapers gained 4.4 per cent over 1923 and only 2.1 per cent over 1924.

In the face of additions to the membership list of the Bureau and of healthy growth in the local circulation field, the slow pace of country circulation growth is evident.

Canadian circulations in the evening field continue to make handsome gains and the Sunday figures also are well ahead of last year's.

Foreign language circulation in the United States show a large gain in the evening field, a static condition on Sunday, and a decline in morning paper totals, which is due to consolidations.

Notable especially in the boxed summaries of the tabulation which appear below and on the next page is the great increase in bulk circulation of U. S. English-language dailies, which is accounted for by the A. B. C. ruling adopted two years ago classing as bulk circulation resulting from certain newspaper promotion methods.

On the next page is given an analysis of circulation totals by States for the United States English language newspapers and for foreign language newspapers and by Provinces for the Canadian newspapers. Grand totals of each of the above groups are also shown and a grand total for the entire listing ends the summary.

Over 1400 Publishers Now Sell Their Space as a Commodity

Membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations places circulation on a commodity basis, because all information is verified by rigid and impartial audit.

Publisher members know that their reputation advances in the minds of the advertiser and space buyer when they offer A. B. C. reports as the basis of their solicitation.

They know that complete and reliable information about quantity, quality, distribution and methods of circulation is what advertisers want.

They know that "A. B. C. Service" makes their advertising space more valuable to the advertiser, because with all this authoritative information before him on uniform, standardized blanks, he is able to use the space to better advantage.

That's why space today has more definable value than before the "A. B. C. Service" made space a commodity.

AUDIT BUREAU OF CIRCULATIONS

In Washington, D. C.

—always a prosperous market with a cosmopolitan audience promptly responsive to well-planned advertising campaigns

The

Washington Times

gained

in 1925 over 1924 with its own startling gain of more than half million agate lines!

"Talk to the Town Through The Times" is more than an apt alliteration—it is a guide post to advertising success

THE WASHINGTON TIMES and THE WASHINGTON HERALD combined circulation 112,554 sold in combination at 25c per line—the largest unit coverage in Washington

The Consistent Leader
in National Advertising

New York Evening Newspapers

NATIONAL advertisers have found through experience that they can depend on their advertising in The Sun to produce satisfactory results—to send customers into the local stores to buy branded and advertised products.

Because of its remarkable ability to create and increase consumer demand, The Sun is an unusually effective medium through which to secure retail distribution and dealer co-operation in New York for nationally advertised merchandise. The local dealers willingly stock and feature products advertised in The Sun because they know that advertising in The Sun brings more sales and increases their profits.

It is no wonder, therefore, that National Advertisers use more space in The Sun month after month and year after year than they use in any other New York evening newspaper.

The Sun	Second Evening Newspaper	The Sun's Lead
1925—3,765,150 Lines	2,774,910 Lines	990,240 Lines
1924—3,018,102 Lines	2,433,392 Lines	584,710 Lines
1923—2,368,588 Lines	2,241,048 Lines	127,540 Lines

The Sun's gain in National advertising in 1925 was larger than the combined gains of all the other New York evening newspapers.

The Sun is a home newspaper. It enables advertisers to reach all members of the family six days a week. Among the intelligent, prosperous, responsive people of New York The Sun has a larger home circulation than any other New York week-day newspaper.

The Sun's superior ability to produce results for advertisers is based on its large, high-class and unusually responsive circulation which is attributable in turn to the high character of The Sun as a newspaper.

A very rigid censorship on all advertising is maintained.

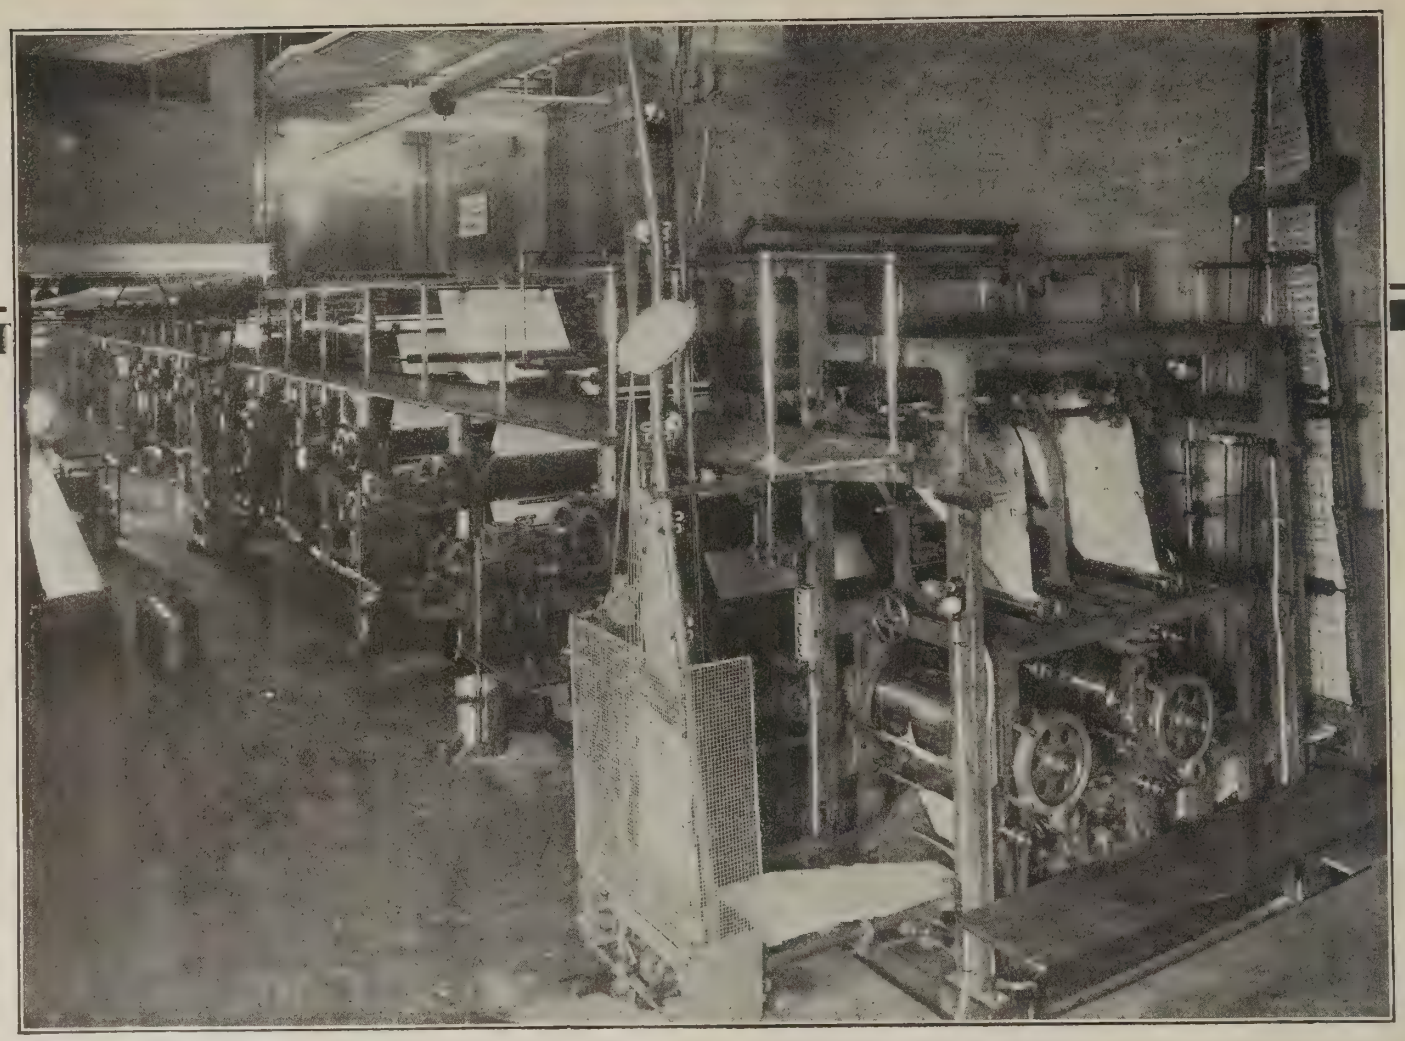
You Need But ONE Paper Here

THE RICH and stable Milwaukee-Wisconsin market provides an exceptional opportunity to build a large volume of sales in 1926 at a remarkably low advertising cost per sale.

Here an advertising dollar can be made to yield better than average results. Only ONE newspaper — The Milwaukee Journal—is needed to thoroughly cover and sell this prosperous market.

The Milwaukee Journal influences the buying habits of more than one half million Wisconsin people, including more than 4 out of every 5 Milwaukee families. The tremendous scope of this influence is reflected in The Milwaukee Journal's 1925 advertising record—this newspaper printed nearly two and a half times as much paid advertising as either of the other two Milwaukee papers:

Total Paid Advertising — 1925
(The 3 Milwaukee Papers)



The Journal	17,539,375 lines
Second paper	7,301,847 lines
Third paper	7,290,613 lines

The Journal led the other two Milwaukee papers combined by a wide margin in every division—local display, national display and classified advertising—during the past year.

The ideal combination of a consistently prosperous market thoroughly covered by ONE newspaper merits your investigation of the possibilities here.

180 Miles of Newsprint an Hour

THE giant 12-Unit Hoe "Superspeed" Unit-Type Press, installed in the Columbus Dispatch, has a capacity of 320,000 12-Page newspapers an hour. Enough paper passes through this marvelous machine in one hour to reach from Columbus to Pittsburgh. In this remarkable performance speed is but part of the picture; because unrivaled net output, flexibility of combinations, simplicity and economy of operation all go to make the Hoe Newspaper Press the supreme expression of mechanical perfection.

R. Hoe & Co.,
New York City.

Gentlemen:-

Hoe and company has kept the faith. One may hesitate when turning from old to new mechanical devices, but he who accepts a Hoe Superspeed Unit-Type press upon the word of its builders, need have no fears.

The twelve-unit machine installed in the Dispatch's new plant is a beautiful thing to the practiced eye, and its performance is a joy born of the splendid workmanship and engineering of its builders.

Its operation is simple, its noiselessness and elasticity for combinations remarkable, and its speed magnificent. It has aroused a real enthusiasm for itself, from the Dispatch's big family, owners to least apprentice boy.

The Dispatch wishes Hoe & Co. long life and continued success. To its courteous personnel this newspaper organization sends cordial greetings.

Most sincerely,

The Dispatch Printing Co.,

Arthur S. Thuson

Editor and Assoc. Publisher.

BREAK LINEAGE RECORDS IN 1926

with the aid of BRIGGS FEATURE PAGES which will add from 100,000 to 500,000 LINES OF NEW BUSINESS TO YOUR TOTAL!

NOW, while you are laying plans for a new record in lineage— a record that will surpass any previous total or place you ahead of your competitor, why not let us show you how we can secure without selling cost to you, from 100,000 to 500,000 lines of additional space from those non-regular advertisers in the industrial, jobbing, manufacturing and wholesale lines?

Let us tell you the story of Briggs' service—about our proven, permanent Feature Pages. Let us show you how more than 80 leading newspapers throughout the United States and Canada are increasing their lineage tremendously with our assistance, year in and year out.

Special Announcement

The Charles Partlowe Company of Indianapolis, takes pardonable pride in the announcement that it has been chosen a member of the Better Business Bureau

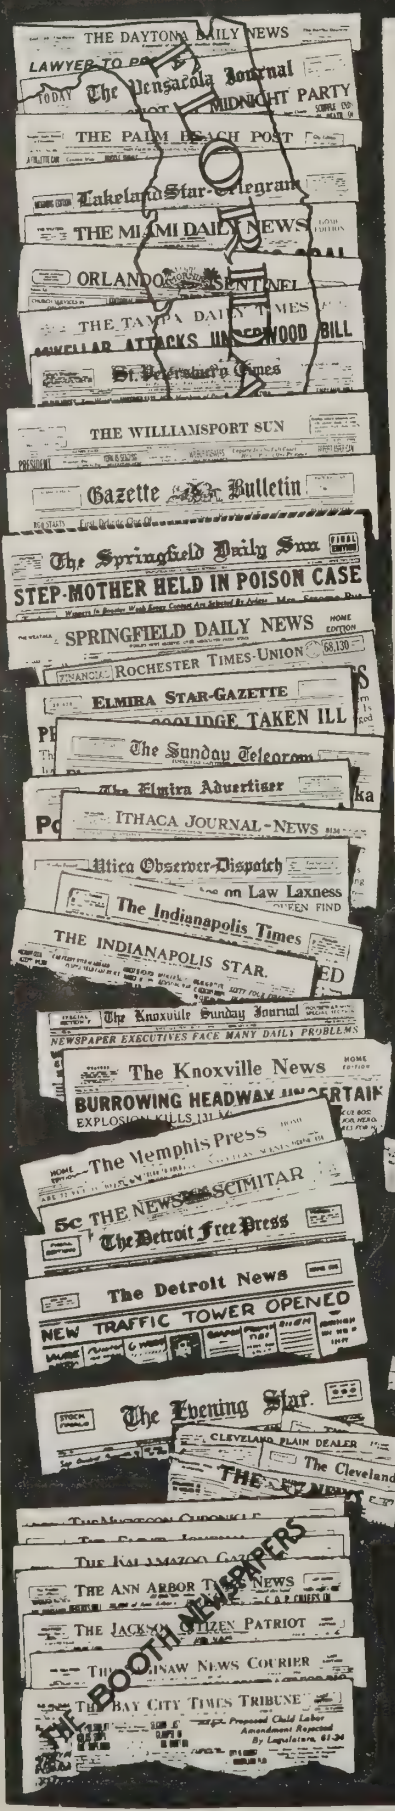
—an honor that has not been accorded to any other circulation-building service or company in newspaperdom.

THE CHARLES PARTLOWE COMPANY, FOR OVER EIGHTEEN YEARS A RECOGNIZED INSTITUTION IN NEWSPAPERDOM, IS THE LARGEST CIRCULATION-BUILDING ORGANIZATION IN THE ENTIRE WORLD. IT WAS FOUNDED AND HAS OPERATED CONTINUOUSLY UPON STANDARDS IN COMPLETE ACCORD WITH THOSE OF THE BETTER BUSINESS BUREAU. ITS ABSOLUTE SUPREMACY IN ITS FIELD AND THE ESTEEM AND CONFIDENCE IN WHICH IT IS HELD BY THE NEWSPAPER FRATERNITY IS DIRECTLY ATTRIBUTED TO THESE PRINCIPLES.



THE CHARLES PARTLOWE COMPANY IS ALSO A MEMBER OF THE INDIANAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

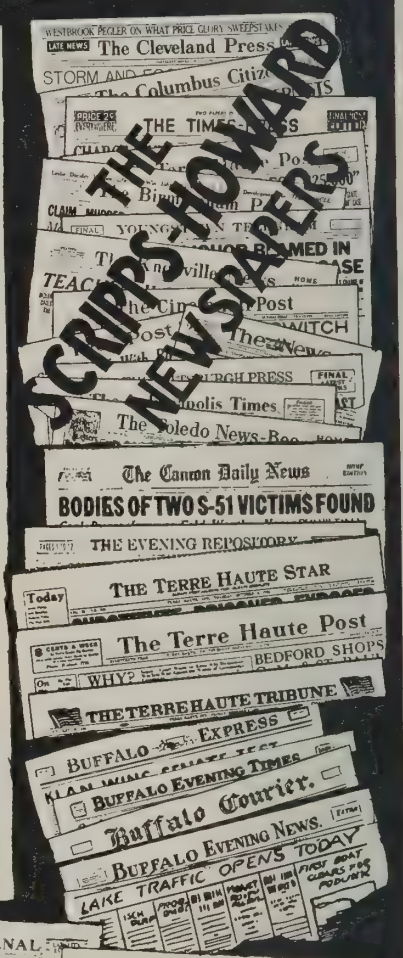
Does the Plus Metal Plan Pay?

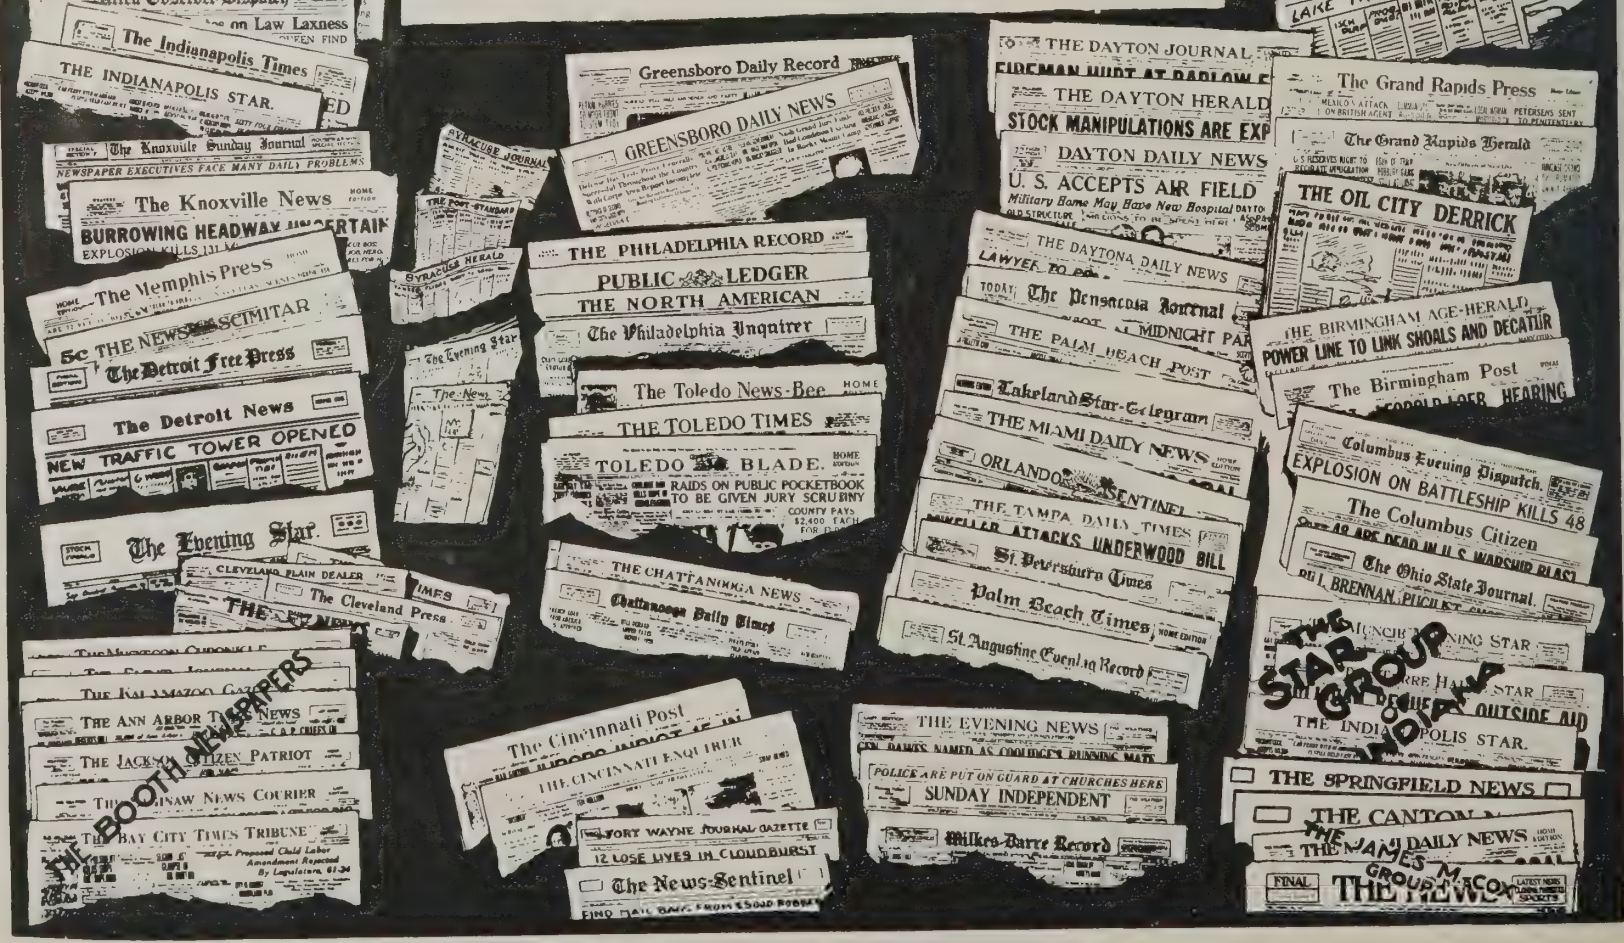
ON this page are reproduced the mastheads of 112 of the thousands of newspapers who depend upon the Imperial Plus Metal Plan to take care of their type metal.

In looking over the names of these papers you will find many leading metropolitan newspapers represented. You will also find many newspapers from small cities.

If the Plus Plan were not dependable and economical, if it did not keep type metal fit at all times, thus adding years of working life to the metal, these papers would never be using the Plus Plan.



The Plus Plan is a plan of service—reliable service—for newspapers regardless of size of shop or circulation. Dependable, economical service is the foundation upon which the remarkable growth of the list of Plus Plan users has been built.



If you are not using the Plus Plan, write and let us send you a copy. Better still, talk to our representative when next he calls.

THE 1926 EDITION OF THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER ANNUAL AND DIRECTORY

IS READY FOR DELIVERY

The 1926 issue of the AMERICAN NEWSPAPER ANNUAL AND DIRECTORY is now ready in two editions. The one, the regular form and size with which the advertising and publishing fraternity is so familiar, at the usual price, $15.00. The other, a special limited edition on thin paper stock for the benefit of those who wish a smaller and lighter volume to conserve shelf and desk space.

This special edition will have a black binding, imitation leather, and will be priced $20.00. The contents are identical, comprising all of the information and features of this old-established reference book with complete gazetteer information revised to date and latest population figures, with 350 lists of different classes of publications and over 100 colored maps.

Announcing

George Batten Corporation

322 SOUTH MICHIGAN AVENUE

CHICAGO

WE have incorporated a company under the laws of the State of Illinois, known as George Batten Corporation, through which our Western business will be served. This will involve no change whatever in the close and co-operative relations now existing among our three offices in New York, Chicago, and Boston.

Several desirable ends, however, are served by the forming of the new Corporation. It is now possible for us to extend to the strong and capable men, Mr. Hurst, Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. Brewer, who have been of such material assistance in the growth and success of our Western business, opportunities for recognition and participation in line with the traditional policy of George Batten, the founder of our business.

The Officers and Directors of the new George Batten Corporation are: William H. Johns, President; R. L. Hurst, Vice-President and General Manager; Charles D. Mitchell, Vice-President; F. R. Feland, Secretary; and R. J. Hayward, Treasurer.

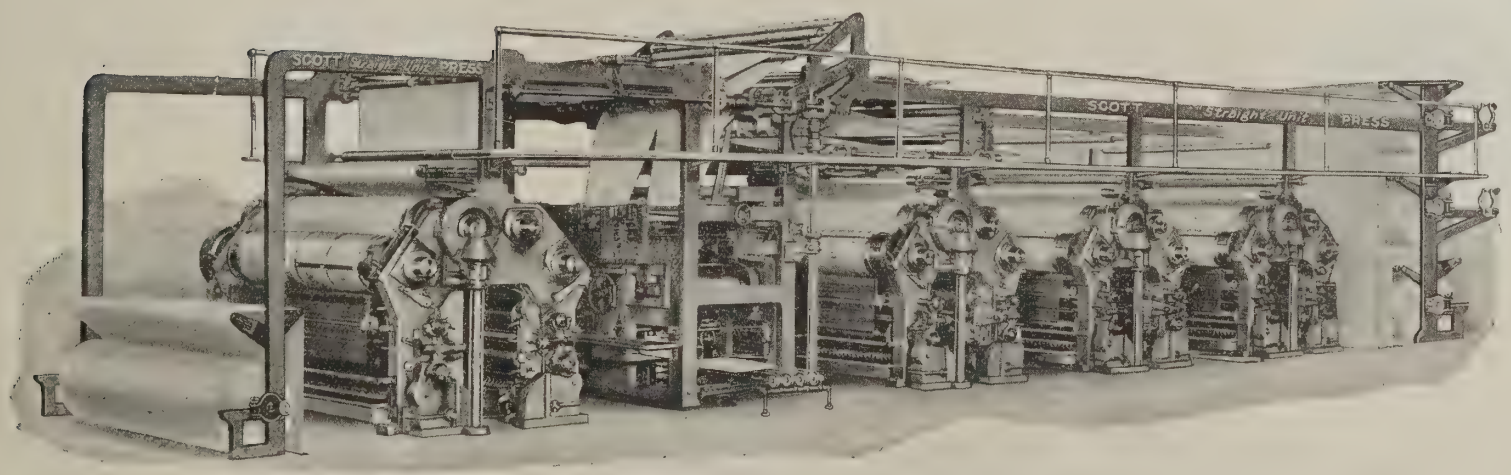
"Multi-Unit" Double Octuple Press with four Central Folders.

First to recognize the advantages of unit press construction—first to develop, build and install a true unit type of press—Walter Scott & Company has today brought both the "Multi-Unit" and "Straight-Unit" types to the highest state of modern press perfection. The use of one or the other depends very largely upon individual publishing conditions.

"Multi-Unit" Presses



Scott

"Straight-Unit" Presses

Installations of the New York Herald-Tribune, New York Daily News, New York Evening Post, Philadelphia Public Ledger, Newark Evening News, Detroit News, Jacksonville Journal, Palm Beach Post, Louisville Herald Post, Chattanooga Times and many other modern plants, have established the supremacy of Scott Unit Press design.

Paul Poiret

THE COSMOS NEWS EDITORIAL SERVICE

William Allen White, as Chairman, and Ida M. Tarbell, Richard Washburn Child, General Henry T. Allen, Bishop Brent, Senator Arthur Capper, George E. Roberts and forty other famous men and women join your staff and supply daily a Cosmos news editorial of six hundred words. Every great event of national or international interest, that breaks in first page news, is presented by the man or woman who knows most about it. This Service supplements your A. P. or U. P. or Special wire with interpretation and background from the highest authorities. Signed articles with big names for either news or editorial page—a unique and incomparable feature. (Special circular and samples on request.)

AT LAST—A GREAT LOCAL FEATURE

The Detroit Free Press calls it "the best children's feature we have ever used"—and that after two years. The Young Verse Writer's Corner, that interests every school and every home. A weekly page from your own young readers and a weekly prize for the best poem—and all done for you. A feature as local as your local news that stirs immense interest and competition. New for the New Year, so quick decision is advised. (Special circular and samples on request.)

GALLI-CURCI'S ADVENTURES

The great singer in six graphic articles tells of her most interesting experiences in many countries. These are to be released as the famous diva is on her concert tour, packing the greatest halls and challenging the attention of press and public everywhere. (Sample articles, fully illustrated, on request.)

GOOD SCOUT ANDY

By Booth, the adventures of the jolliest boy and girl scout in daily strip form. The only cartoon of its kind to receive official recognition and approval from the Boy Scouts Association of America. Clean, wise, instructive, with a serial interest, and full of laughter, this feature is certain to be popular with young and old alike. (Write for prospectus containing four weeks' sample releases and copies of testimonials from the Scout Leaders of America.)

STEFANSSON'S "GREAT ARCTIC HIGHWAY"

Nine expeditions go to the Arctic this spring. On March 21st, the day the first one hops off from Point Barrow (Capt. Wilkins') this absorbing series begins. Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the most famous of all explorers and the ablest writer among them, is writing six dramatic articles of a new and different kind—giving the commercial possibilities of the North, the future of air transit between West and East, high over the Arctic circle, the need of supply stations and a vast amount of fresh vision and knowledge. Here at last is the great Saga of the Arctic, showing a new conquest at hand for the service of the world. (Two sample articles and complete scenario of series on request.)

LUCILLE LORRAINE PATTERNS

A hundred papers are now carrying these patterns, daily, pleasing their women readers and making money for themselves. A twenty cent pattern that gives general satisfaction. This service free to the paper with a profit on every pattern. (A telegram starts the service for you immediately.)

THE PARIS FASHION BOARD

Fashions every week from their world-famous creators, Worth, Lanvin, Paul Poiret, Lelong, Jean Patou. A weekly feature in a signed article by a great master of the mode with beautiful illustrations. The paper with this great feature at once takes the place of acknowledged fashion supremacy in the homes and in the stores; telephone an inquiry to your three leading stores and ask your Advertising Manager. (Samples on request.)

DAVID BELASCO, ADVENTURER

The most vivid reminiscences in ten years. The world-famous dramatist has done no greater play than this, his own life story. Now running in twelve weekly instalments, fully illustrated. (Circular and two releases on request.)

David Belasco

MAGIC DECORATIVE MOTIFS

A weekly feature by Sybille Mayer, supplied to you gratis. Increase your women readers with this wonder feature. Help bring softly blended colors into the home and make money for yourself. Magic Decorative Motifs sell for one dollar. We will return twenty cents to you for each order sent us by your readers. (Send for sample releases or wire order collect and start this circulation booster today.)

CODED LIMERICKS

A daily feature by S. B. Dickson. Print a Coded Limerick today and you've sold tomorrow's paper. Novelty is the breath of journalism. White hot features are as important as red hot news. Coded Limericks is the clever, captivating, humorous feature which grips readers. (Sample week's release of original limericks on request.)

FROM A FLAPPER'S NOTEBOOK

By Constance Talmadge, famous film star, being the diary of Dorothy Brown with parallel extracts from the diary of her mother. The story of a modern life-loving girl in contrast to her mother at the same age. This feature, well written, mellow and with a big double appeal goes big. Forty-eight releases. The celebrated screen beauty has also prepared a sequel in "A Flapper's Honeymoon"—or the diary of Dorothy Brown after she has become Mrs. Hastings. (Sample releases of both features on request.)

Constance Talmadge

LINCOLN ELLSWORTH'S OWN STORY

The intrepid young American, Amundsen's second in command, has done a stirring short series of four weekly articles. The Boston Post and St. Louis Post-Dispatch telegraphed for the series the moment they heard they were in preparation. (Sample releases on request.)

J. St. Loe Strachey

AS ENGLAND SEES AMERICA

The distinguished author and famous editor of The Spectator, J. St. Loe Strachey, has just got back to London from a long tour of observation in the United States. He is doing ten weekly articles, each a column long, giving his penetrating and friendly impressions—a truly notable series. (Two sample releases on request.)

WHAT'S HE DOING NOW?

A three time a week two column sport cartoon by Maxwell. The Public makes and unmakes its heroes daily. Where are the idols of yesteryear? After the final game, the count out, the last public ovation, what becomes of sportdom's mighty figures, the ball players, the prize fighters, the gridiron stars, the swimmers, the golfers, the deep chested wrestlers? None of your readers have forgotten the names of Hackenschmidt, Gunboat Smith, Jimmy Wilde, "Duke" Kahanamoku, Elmer Oliphant, Cy Young—the "Pitching Fool," Dan McLeod. Tell them in cartoon and brief text where the old timers are now! (Special circulars and samples on request.)

Paul Pim

"TELLING TOMMY" FOR YOUNG AND OLD

An educational comic strip that wins and holds friends everywhere. Pim, the artist, is a genius, having the rare gift of pictorializing knowledge. Scores of papers are enthusiastic over this feature, which answers your readers' questions in strip form. (A month's daily releases sent for free try-out.)

Linotype Magazines Changed from the Front

LINOTYPE magazines are quickly and easily changed from the front. Any magazine may be removed and replaced by another in a few seconds without disturbing the other magazines. Changes are made in exactly the same way on both Single Distribution and Mutiple Distribution (Mixing) Linotypes.

TRADE LINOTYPE MARK

Linotype Magazines All Operated from a Single Power-Driven Keyboard

A LINOTYPE, either of the Single Distribution or Multiple Distribution (Mixing) type, has only one keyboard. The operator can set matrices from any magazine (including the auxiliary magazines) without leaving his seat or changing his position.

TRADE LINOTYPE MARK

Linotype Magazines Interchangeable

ANY Standard Linotype Magazine, either main or auxiliary, can be used on either Single Distribution or Multiple Distribution (Mixing) Linotypes.

Linotypes of the various models can be equipped to cast either 30 or 42 picas maximum measure

DUPLEX

THE ONLY COMPLETE LINE OF WEB PRESSES OFFERED TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS

DUPLEX SUPER-UNIT DOUBLE OCTUPLE
(AS INSTALLED NEW YORK WORLD)
METROPOLITAN—HEAVY DUTY—INTERCHANGEABLE UNITS—SOLID STEEL GEARS THROUGHOUT ROLLS BELOW OR AT END—INDEPENDENT DRIVE SYSTEM

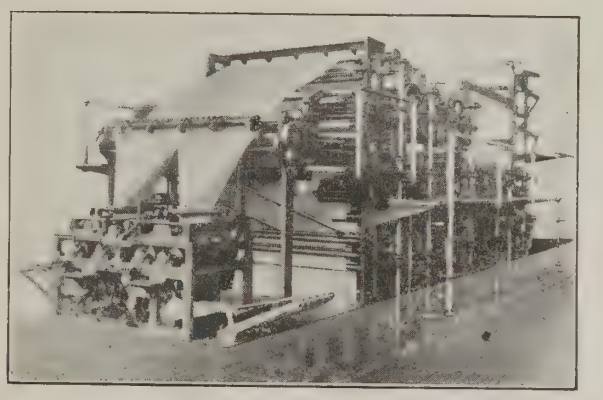
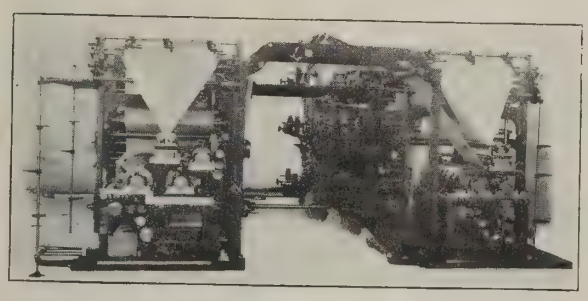
A NEW STANDARD OF EXCELLENCE
THE DUPLEX SUPER-UNIT



UNIT TYPE CENTER FOLDER SEXTUPLE.
WITH ROLLS OVERHEAD GIVING SHORTEST WEB LEAD FROM ROLL TO IMPRESSION.
BUILT IN QUAD, SEXTUPLE, OCTUPLE, DECUPLE, ETC.



All Duplex Presses of larger than 8-page capacity have absolutely unit type construction, each unit separately driven as a protection for emergency use and a convenience when reduced runs are wanted.

All gears of heavy duty burden are of special material, steel or manganese bronze, of high test burden strength and extra heavy for safety—the best material and best design possible. All high speed bearings are unusually large and conform to the best engineering practice.

In the larger capacity presses which are all of unit construction the unit basis and all parts are made identical and interchangeable, features obtainable in no other presses now on the market. In cases of multiple folders, folder drives are absolutely independent as units by themselves, and no folder is dependent upon the other in operation.

METROPOLITAN HEAVY DUTY 40-PAGE "TUBULAR."
DOUBLE PRODUCTS AT FULL SPEED FROM 40 PLATES INSTEAD OF 80. THE MOST PRODUCTIVE AND EFFICIENT PRESS IN THE WORLD. ALL "TUBULAR" PRESSES ARE BUILT UPON THE UNIT PLAN.

THE TWINNED TUBULARS.

"Our customers write our ads"

We are glad to refer you to any user of Duplex machinery as to facts and experience. We can give you any number of references upon request in any part of the country which you may wish. For instance:

One says "Studied presses several months. Visited factories and newspapers. Convinced Duplex is building best presses. Everything finest materials, finest construction."—Evening Courier.

THE STANDARD 16-PAGE "TUBULAR"; FOR INTERMEDIATE FIELD NEWSPAPERS.
By leaving out a unit or adding more units this construction of press is easily furnished, also of 12-page, 20-page or 24-page capacity. Any smaller sizes can be increased to larger capacity without disturbance in pressroom.
One plate per page and full speed operation for any and all products.

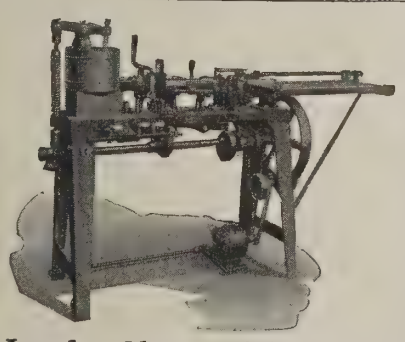
For Superior Display Use the Ludlow



FIGURED on the basis of advertising, the value of your paper depends upon the results it will bring your advertisers. Results are based on two things—the message your advertisers tell—the way they tell it. The message that is told is the advertisers' problem—the way it's told is yours.

Every advertisement in your paper set in distinctive, snappy faces, every letter clean and perfect, brings results for advertisers, brings more advertising for you.

Important as the Ludlow advantages of speed and economy are, it's the results that the Ludlow brings on the finished page that has led to the almost universal adoption of this system by discriminating newspapers the world over.

Make this test—look over a representative group of America's dailies. Those that constantly run better advertisements—those whose pages are always bright and clean—a pleasure to read—you will find are almost invariably Ludlow-equipped.

The reason? It's plain—the Ludlow is the only possible system by which faces can be produced as needed from 6 to 60 point roman or full-flowing italic, bold and extended included.

Leads - Slugs - Plain Rules
All You Need!

THE Elrod Slug Caster brings to the composing room an inexhaustible source of supply for leads, slugs and plain rules of various point sizes cut to any length.

Practically automatic and extremely simple, it does not require constant attendance of an expert operator or machinist. It can be operated with minimum attention by almost anyone.

Changes from one size or kind of product to another are made quickly with no intricate adjustments.

Elrod material is solid and stands up under the most severe press and stereotyping conditions.

A Few Ludlow Display Faces

Perfectly — Ludlow Black

Forceful — Ludlow Black Italic

Distributing — Ludlow Number 11-B

Consolidates — Ludlow Number 11-BI

Subscriptions — Ludlow Number 11-L

Modernization — Ludlow Number 11-LI

Thoroughly — Ludlow Artcraft Light

Masterful — Ludlow Artcraft Light Italic

The above eight faces are representative members of the Ludlow library of matrices which numbers more than 400 fonts.

Art Gravure Supplements
from THE CANADIAN LINE to MEXICO CITY

The Essence of Service

To be able to assist newspaper publishers intelligently as follows—

Preparation of striking page layouts.
Selecting photographs of interest.
Writing captions that sparkle.
Effective circulation methods.
Preparing advertisements that pull.
Training your solicitors to sell.
Cooperation on national accounts.
Quality printing on close schedule.

THAT is Art Gravure Service

Art Gravure Corporation
NEW YORK CHICAGO CLEVELAND
General Offices: 406 W. 31st St., New York

"AS YOU WOULD SEE IT

One Picture is Worth Ten Thousand Words

Editorially: This is an age of pictures; and rotogravure with its pictured news, is in the spirit of the times, adding zest to the modern newspaper. It appeals to every group from infancy to old age. It is interesting, educational and timely.

Circulation: Many papers have made permanent, substantial increases in circulation at reasonable cost through rotogravure. Not only among dwellers in the city proper, but in the profitable outlying sections as well, rotogravure gets and holds circulation throughout the entire trading area.

Advertising: Retail merchants understand what a powerful force rotogravure is, in bringing specific merchandise to their customers' attention, and they gladly invest in it as an additional medium. In this way rotogravure has created many thousand lines of new advertising in a steady volume consistently spread throughout the year.

We shall gladly furnish further information to publishers interested in a rotogravure section, either as a regular feature or an occasional specialty.

DOROTHY DIX SERVICE

"We have been using the 'DOROTHY DIX TALKS' for a score of years, and like them better each year. No writer has a greater appeal to women of all ages."—C. W. Danziger,

—PITTSBURGH CHRONICLE-TELEGRAPH

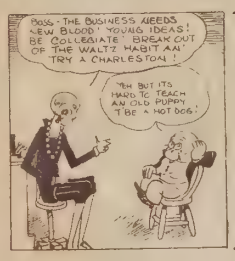
HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR SERIALS

"Boston POST readers thought so highly of the Batchelor Stories that we solicited and entered into a long-time contract for the greater part of the New England rights to Mrs. Batchelor's future writings."

—BOSTON POST.

"DAILY MIRROR OF WASHINGTON"

"We consider the 'DAILY MIRROR OF WASHINGTON' one of the best editorial page features we have ever printed. It makes the figures in public life real, living human beings."



—NEW ORLEANS TIMES-PICAYUNE.

SYKES' CARTOONS

"Few men doing daily cartoons have maintained such a consistently high batting average as C. H. Sykes. Where others shadow box with a subject, he puts over the punch every time."

—Editor of LIFE, New York.

"SOMEBODY'S STENOG"

"We consider 'SOMEBODY'S STENOG' the second best of eight comics we are now using. This comic met with immediate favor, and interest in it has never dwindled."—F. W. Clarke,

—ATLANTA CONSTITUTION.

"HAIRBREADTH HARRY"

"I have always thought that 'HAIRBREADTH HARRY' is the best comic published anywhere, barring none. I think it is the funniest, most colorful and cleverest comic being turned out."

—H. M. Crist, Managing Editor,
BROOKLYN EAGLE.

"THE BOY FRIEND"

"We regard 'THE BOY FRIEND' as peculiarly representative of the innocent, pleasant, frivolous aspects of youthful life in our present age and as a relief from the coarser tendencies of so much flapper humor."

—CHICAGO DAILY NEWS.

"DUMB BELLS"

"The Boston GLOBE publishes 'DUMB BELLS' top of column alongside of advertising on its first page. That's the way they do it in Boston. The Brooklyn STANDARD UNION publishes 'DUMB BELLS' top of column next to reading matter on the last page, where we do not print any advertising. That's the way they do it in Brooklyn. But no matter how they do it, 'DUMB BELLS' always gets preferred position in preferred newspapers."

—R. F. R. Huntsman,
BROOKLYN STANDARD UNION.

PARIS FASHIONS, by EVA A. TINGEY

"The PARIS FASHION LETTER of Eva Tingey is one of the features best liked by women readers of the POST. They find it timely and interesting and the clever little sketches which accompany the text are extremely helpful to them."

—Merritt Bond, Managing Editor,
N. Y. EVENING POST.

"MILADY BEAUTIFUL," by LOIS LEED

"'MILADY BEAUTIFUL' is drawing from 600 to 900 letters per week. There is no question about its popularity when such a response comes from our readers."

—Ella Gordon Smith, Woman's Editor,
DETROIT NEWS.
